Mishnah (mish-nah), n. [*Also Mishna; Heb.
mishnah, repetition, explanation, < shanah, repeat.*]
1. In Jewish lit., a collection of halachoth or binding precepts and legal decisions deduced by the ancient rabbis from the Penta-teuch, and itself forming a second or oral law.

See halachah. These halachoth, which had been preserved for several centuries by tradition among the doctors of the synagogue, were gradually committed to writing. The first who attempted to reduce them to order was Hillel I. (c. 70 B. C. to 10 A. D.), president of the Sanhedrin, who arranged them in six Schulim or orders. The final redaction, however, was made by Rabbi Jehudah, surnamed
"the be-sha," about the end of the second century of our era.

The Mishnah is divided into six parts, each of which contains a number of treatises, which are subdivided into chapters, and these again into paragraphs or mishnoth.

The first part is a list of seventy-two tractates, the second regulates the manner of observing festivals; the third treats of women and matrimonial cases; the fourth of damages and losses in trade, etc.; the fifth is on "holy things"—that is, oblations, sacrifices, etc.; and the sixth treats of the several sorts of purification. The Mishnah forms the text on which the Gemara is based. See Gemara and Talmud.

The Mishnah consists chiefly of Halakhoth; there is, comparatively speaking, little Agadah to be found in it.
It is not, however, as many think, either a commentary on the Halakhoth portions of the Pentateuch, or on the ordinances of the Sopherim, or on both together. It rather presupposes the knowledge of and respect for both the Mosaic and the Sopherim laws, and it only discusses, and finally decides on, the best mode and manner of executing them. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 608.

2. [< l. e.; pl. mishnoth (mish'noth).] A paragraph of the Mishnah.

A mishnah, if genuine, never begins with a passage of the Pentateuch, and even comparatively seldom brings direct proof from or gives reference to it. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 608.

Mishnaic (mish-na'ik), n. [< Mishna(h) + -ic.]
Of or pertaining to the Mishnah; traditional.

The weighty reference to the Mishnaic usage remains,

A sad miss of him.

Massinger, Bashful Lover, II. 1.

5. Specifically, in printing, a failure on the part of the person feeling the blank sheets to a press to supply a sheet at the right moment for impression. The miss must be corrected by running through several sheets to absorb the ink put on the blanks by the form.

6. In the game of loo, an extra hand dealt out, for which the players in turn have the option of exchanging their own. — A miss is as good as a mile, a narrow escape is no worse than a remote one; so one escapes a danger it does not matter much how near it approached.

miss (mis), adv. [ME. mis, mys, mysse = D. mis = feel, mis, adv., wrong, amiss; see miss, r. Cf. miss, n., amiss.] Wrongly; badly; amiss.

The things ben so mys entrenchanted.

Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose b.

To correcten that is mis I moute.

Chaucer, Prologue to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 146.

miss (mis), n. [An abbr. of mistress, at first prob. as a title, the form Mistress, as written Mrs. and pronounced mis'tres, being still commonly abbreviated in rustic use in New England and among the Southern negroes, to Mess, often printed Mis. Cf. also def. 3. See mistress, Mrs.] 1. Mistress; a reduced form of this title, which, so reduced, came to be regarded, when prefixed to the name of a young woman or girl, as a sort of diminutive, and was especially applied to young girls (corresponding to maister as applied to young boys), older unmarried girls or women being styled mistress even in the lifetime of the mother; later, and in present use, a title prefixed to the name of any unmarried woman or girl. In a restricted use, the title Mis, with the surname only, now distinguishes the eldest daughter of a family the younger daughters having the title Miss prefixed to their full name: as, Miss Brown, Miss Mary Brown, etc. Some unmarried women holding independent positions as householders or otherwise are still styled Mistress (Mrs.) as a mark of special respect, at least in some parts of the United States. In speaking or writing of two or more persons of the same name by the title of Miss, the plural form is often given to the name as a whole, as the Miss Smiths, instead of to the title, as the Misses Smith.

The four Miss Willises. Dickens, Sketches, III.

Miss Gust held her chin too high, and . . . Miss Laura spoke and moved continually with a view to effect. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iv. 9.

Her eyes to me "Are you Mrs. or Miss?" "Neither, ma'am," I says, "I are a servant." That young woman respects herself and her calling. St. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 256.

2. A young unmarried woman; a girl. In this sense chiefly colloquial; in trade use it has reference to sizes, etc.: as, ladies', misses', and children's sizes.

Where there are little masters and misses in a house, they are great impediments to the diversion of the servants. Shelf.

Sometimes I half wish I were merely

A plain or a penniless miss.

Locke, A Slee Correspondent.

3. A mistress (of a household). [Southern U. S., in negro use.] — 4. [In this use a direct abbr. of mistress in the same sense—a slang use, independent of the above.] A kept mistress.

She being taken to be the Earle of Oxford's miss (as at this time they began to call low women).

Edgyn, Diary, Jan. 9, 1662.

Undeacent women, . . . inflaming several young noble-men and gallants, became their misses.

Edgyn, Diary, Oct. 18, 1666.

If after all you think it a disgrace

That Edward's miss thus perks it in your face.

Pope, Epil. to Rowe's Jane Shore, l. 46.

missa (mis'sh), v. [LL. missa; see mass.] 1. The mass; a mass. — 2. In the Mozarabic liturgy, a variable prayer or address, called more fully the Oratio Missa (Prayer of the Mass), answering to the Gallican Preſatio Missa (Preface of the Mass). It probably derived its name from the fact that the dismissal (missa) of the catechumens originally preceded it.

missal (mis'al), a. and n. [L. a. = OF. missal, < ML. missalis, of the mass, < missa, the mass; see mass.] 1. n. = P. missal = Sp. missal = Fr. missal = It. missale, < ML. missale, a mass-book, neut. of missalis, of the mass; see L.] 2. a. Pertaining to the mass, or to the missal or Roman Catholic mass-book.

It had been good for our missal priests to have dwelled in that country. Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI. 1549.

Missal Missal. See Missal, 2.

II. n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the book containing all the liturgical forms necessary for celebrating mass throughout the year. Orignally the ordinary, canon, and some other parts of the mass were contained in the sacramentary, which also included the offices for the other sacraments. In addition to this the antiphony, lectionary, and evangeliary had to be used. Early in the eighth century the name of missal (missale (sc. liber), missale) came to be applied to the sacramentary, and later to books containing additional parts of the mass. A book like the modern missal, containing all the forms of the mass, was called a plenarium missale (plenarium missale). The modern Roman missal (the "reformed missal") was issued substantially in its present form under Pius V. in 1570, and revised again under Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. It is the only Latin missal allowed to be used in the Roman Catholic Church, with the exception of the limited local use of the Ambrosian, Mozarabic, and some monastic rites. Roman Catholic priests in England do not follow the missal and other ancient English uses, but the present Roman rite. The United and other Latinizing communities in Oriental countries are allowed to retain their ancient offices, with alterations more or less considerable. In the Roman missal, after the introductory matter (exordium, general rubric, etc.) come the Introit, collects, epistles, gospels, graduals, offertories, etc., and some monastic rites. The ordinary and canon of the mass are placed in the middle of the book, between the proper of Holy Saturday and that of Easter Sunday. After these missae de tempore follow the common of saints, votive and special masses, etc., and masses allowed to be used in special places. The exhortation of the Greek Church answers not to the missal, but to the original sacramentary.

The sacramentary became subdivided into the full mass-book or missal properly so named.

Rock, Church of our Father, III. 11. 19.

As tender and reverent . . . as a nun over her missal. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, II.

Mistlethrush (Turdus viscivorus).

rope, and some parts of western Asia and northern Africa. Like the fieldfare, mavis, redbird, blackbird, and ring-ouzel, it is an abundant and well-known English thrush. It is the largest European bird of its kind, measuring from 11 to 11½ inches in length and about 10½ in extent of wings. The form is stout, and the coloration most like that of the song thrush, T. muscivorus. The upper parts are grayish-brown, grayer on the head, and of a yellowish tinge on the rump; there is a whitish streak from the bill over the eye, and the under parts are whitish, profusely spotted with black. Also called, locally, durin-cock, three-cock, bulmistrush, arceuthrush.

We meet in Aristotle with one kind of thrush called the mistle thrush, or feeder upon mistletoe.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 6.

mistletoe (miz'- or mis'tl-tō), n. [Formerly also missetoe, missetoe, missetoe, misseto, var. missetden, missetden, missetden; < ME. missetton* (?), < AS. missettan, missettan (= Icel. missettan = Dan. missetten), mistletoe, < mistel, bird-lime, also mistletoe, and basil, + tan, a twig; see mistle and tan.] The second element, having passed out of common use as a separate word, suffered alteration to -toe, the radical final n being apparent, taken as the old plural suffix -n.] A European plant, Viscum album, of the natural order Loranthaceae, growing parasitically on various trees. It is a jointed dichotomous shrub, with sessile, oblong entire leaves, and small yellowish-green flowers, the whole forming a pendent bush, which is covered in winter with small white berries containing a glutinous substance. The shrub is said to be disemitted by birds, which eat the berries and disperse the undigested seeds in their droppings. It is found on a great variety of trees, especially the apple-tree, but seldom on the oak. The mistletoe (compare def. 2) was consecrated to religious purposes by the ancient Celtic nations of Europe, and was held in peculiar veneration by the Druids, especially when found growing on the oak. Traces of this old superstition regard the mistletoe still survive in European countries, as in the custom of kissing under it at Christmas. It was formerly highly esteemed as an antispasmodic, but is not now so used. It seems, however, to have some pharmacodynamic properties.

Branch of Mistletoe (Viscum album), with fruits. a, longitudinal section through the male flower; b, the female inflorescence.

Like some rare Fruit-Tree over-topped with spight
 Of Briony and Rushes . . .
 Till chaunt withall, it dies as they do grow,
 And beneath nought but Moss and Mistletoe.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Vocation.
 The mistletoe hung in the castle hall,
 The holly branch shone on the old oak-wall.
T. H. Bayly, The Mistletoe Bough.

2. A plant of some other species of Viscum, or of one of the genera Loranthus, Phoradendron, and Arceuthobium, their species almost all having the same parasitic habit. The mistletoe (Viscum) mentioned by Latin writers in their account of the Druids is thought by some to have been Loranthus Europæus of southern Europe, said to grow on a species of oak in the south of France. The mistletoe of the eastern United States is Phoradendron fasciosum, common on various trees, especially the tupelo and red maple. See pal bush.

'the master-wind,' < maestre, master, < L. magister, master; see master.] In southern France and vicinity, a cold and dry northwest wind which blows in furious gusts from time to time in much of that region, notably in winter. The mistral derives its peculiar properties from the character of the country over which it blows; it extends from the mouth of the Rhone to the Gulf of Genoa, but is strongest and most frequent over Provence, and especially in the delta of the Rhone. Also written maestral.

When the Mistral blows, the sky is almost always blue and cloudless, and the air very dry; the contrast between the prevailing sunshine and the piercing cold of the wind is very striking. In the Rhone valley every second day is a Mistral day. In Marseilles it blows 175 days in the year.
Fischer.

It is only truth to say, however, that the mistral, an old, cold, rattling northeast wind, blows here in the winter, and gives Avignon a bad name.
C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, I.

for the support of a boom or mast. See crutch.

3 (d). [Local, Eng.]

Mitchella (mi-chel'ä), n. [< Nl. (Linnaeus, 1753), named after John Mitchell, a botanist of Virginia.] A genus of plants of the natural order Rubaceae and the tribe Anthospermeae, characterized by having perfect flowers with a funnel-shaped corolla, which is from three- to six-lobed, the stamens inserted upon its throat, and by the hairy style, which has four thread-shaped lobes. They are creeping herbs, with opposite round ovate leaves having minute stipules and small white fragrant dimorphic flowers, which are axillary or terminal, and grow in pairs. The fruit is a scarlet berry.
like double drupe. There are 2 species, an American M. repens the partridge-berry, and a Japanese, which, however, may be identical with the American. See partridge-berry.

mite (mit), n. [*< ME. mite, myte, < AS. mite = Ml. mite, D. mijt = MlG. mite, < OHG. mizt, mizt, MHG. mizt, < (after L.) mite = Dan. mule (cf. F. mule, Sp. mula, Ml. mite, < Lg.), a mite; prob. lit. 'cutter,' 'biter,' from the verb shown in Goth. matan = leel, mita =
AS. matan, cut; see camel, ant.] 1. A small arachnid of the order Acari; any acarid.
Mites are formed a comprehensive genus Acarus or family Acari, terms not yet obsolete; but, with the introduction of many more genera, the establishment of several families, and the elevation of the group to the rank of an order, a more elaborate nomenclature has been established, in which neither Acarus nor Acari is retained. (See Acari.) Adult mites are eight-legged like most arachnids, but some six-legged immature forms at one time constituted a supposed genus Leptus. (See Leptus, and cut under harvest-bug.) The species of mites are very numerous, diversified in form, and various in habits. Many are parasitic, others are terrestrial or aquatic; others live in cheese, four, sugar, etc. Mite is consequently much used in a position. The cheese-mite or flour mite is Tyrophagus casei or T. longus; the sugar-mite is Tyrophagus putrescentis, or another of the same genus. Such mites compose the family Tyrophagidae, and are among those longer known as species of Acarus or Acari. Ich mites are Sarcoptidae, as Sarcoptes scabiei (See cut under itch mite). Mangemites are Demodidae; garden-mites or harvest mites, Trombididae; spinning mites, Tetranychidae; beetle mites or wood-mites, Oribatidae; spider-mites, Gamasidae; water mites, Hydrachnidae; snout mites, Blattidae; gall mites, Phyllophaga. Certain mites, the Isotrichidae, are commonly distinguished as lice, as Trochus ricinus (see cut under Acari), and those of the family Trombididae are indifferently called harvest-mites harvest ticks harvest bugs red bugs, and by other names. See the compound and technical names.*

That cheese of itself breeds mites or maggots, I deny

Ray, Works of Creation, II

Ray what the use, were flour optics given,
To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?

Pope, Essay on Man, l. 18.

2. Some insect like or likened to a mite, as a dust-louse (Phocæus).

For life is so high a perfection of being that in this respect the least fly or mite is a more noble being than a star.

South Works III. 1.

mite (mit), n. [*< ME. mite, myte (= OF. mite, a small coin, = Sp. mite, a payment, a session, lit.
tribute), < Ml. mite, D. mijt, small coin, a mite; prob. akin to mite, from the same root, Goth.
matan, etc., cut; see mite.*] 1. A small coin of any kind, of slight value; any very small sum of money. No coin seems to have been so called specifically.

William without any more.

Gratified him as gall as any coin that he
Of all the a-thr that to knif lodged,

So that non mist a mite worth, I wene.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4543.

And though the number of sheep in rouse never so fast, yet the price falleth not one mite, because there be so few sellers.

Mr T. More, 1 tropic (tr. by Robinson), l.

There came a certain poor widow and she threw in (i. e., into the treasury) two mites (tr. Gr. lepta; see lepta and mites), which make a farthing.

Mark xii. 42

We usually observe the same routine. I put down my mite first; then my young family enroll their contributions . . . and then Mr. Fardigle brings up the rear.

Dickens, Bleak House, viii.

2. An English weight somewhat heavier than a grain troy. — 3. An old money of account, the twenty-fourth part of a penny.

4 mites is the aliquot part of a penny, viz. $\frac{1}{24}$, for a times 4 is 24, and so many mites merchants assign to 1 penny.

T. Hill, Arithmetick (1600), III. l.

4. Anything very small; a very little particle or quantity; also applied to persons.

"Now leh see," said I, "that engerge ne phialke May nat a mite availle to mellen a yene Eldre."

Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 170.

I felt benevolence for her, and resolved some way or other to throw in my mite of courtesy, if not of service.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 18.

The White Sulphur waters, she said, had not done her a mite of good.

C. D. Warner, French Pilgrimage, p. 26.

mited (mit'ed), a. [< mite + ed.] Damaged or spoiled by insufficient salting, as cured fish.

Mitella (mi-tel'ä), n. [*< Nl. (Tournefort, 1700),
= L. mitella, dim. of mitra, a turban; see miter.*]

A genus of plants of the natural order Saxifragaceae and the tribe Saxifragaceae, characterized by a one-celled ovary with parietal placentas which are alternate with the stigmas, five petals which are three-lobed or pinnatifid, and a superior capsule without beak. They are herbs, with long petiolate heart-shaped lobed or ovate leaves, which have membranaceous stipules attached to the petioles, and an erect slender scape bearing an elongated raceme of small greenish flowers, which are often drooping. There are 5 species, indigenous to the temperate parts of North America, one of which is also found in Siberia. M. diphylla and
M. nuda are the best known. See hishop's cap.

miter, mitre (mî'tër), n. [Early mod. E. also myter, mytre; *< ME. mitre, myter, mytre, mytre, < OF. mitre, F. mitre = Pr. Sp. Ig. mitra = It.
mitra, Olt. mitra, a miter, < L. mitra, < Gr.
μῆτρον, a belt, girdle, fillet, head-band, turban.*]

1. A form of head dress anciently worn by the inhabitants of Lydia, Phrygia, and other parts of Asia Minor. — 2. A sacerdotal head-dress, as that worn by the ancient Jewish high priest, or that worn by a bishop. The Jewish miter was made of linen, and wrapped in folds about the head, like a turban. Before the fourteenth century the miter in the Christian church was low and simple; but now it consists of a coronet, surmounted by a lofty and deeply cleft cap. The privilege of wearing the miter in the Roman Catholic Church was a concession of the popes, and was formerly exercised by cardinals and the higher digitaries. Bishops and abbots (if to be mitered) receive the miter from the consecrat-ing bishop. Three kinds of miters are distinguished:

(1) the precious miter, made of gold or silver plate and adorned with jewels, (2) the auriphyllate miter, and (3)
the simple miter of white silk or linen. The bishops of the Church of England wore miters as late as the coronation of George III. and some Anglican bishops occasionally wear them at the present day. See tiara, and cut under auriphyllate.

Her golden cap she cast unto the ground,
And crowned inidre rudely throw aside.

Spenser, F. Q., l. viii. 26.

The Cardinal (Walsley) sent to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, which he used to wear at any great Solemnity.

Baker, Chronicle, p. 279.

3. A chimney-cap or -pot of terra-cotta, brick, stone, or metal, designed to exclude rain and wind from the flue, while allowing the smoke, etc., to escape; a cowel; hence, anything having a similar use.

For like as in a Linbeck th' heat of Fire
Knoweth a Vapour, which still mounting higher

To the steeple top, when th' odoriferous sweet Above the Miter can no further get

It, softly thickening, falleth drop by drop

Spenser, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

French type of the 14th century

Miter of glass (patent) 14th century. From Semur-en-Auxois, France.

4. In conch., a miter-shell. — 5. In carp.: (a) A scribe or guide for making saw-cuts to form miter-joints. (b) A combined square and miter-edge or pattern. (c) Same as miter-joint. — 6. A gusset in seamstresses' work, knitting, and the like. — Miter gearing. Same as beveled gearing (which see, under gearing).

mitre (mī'tēr), v.; pret. and pp. mitered, mitred, ppr. mitring, mitring. [Early mod. E. also myler, mytre; < ME. mitren, mytren, < OF. mitrer, mytr; < Sp. Pg. mitrar = It. mitrare. OIt. metrar, < ML. mitrare, < mitra, a miter; see miter, n.] 1. trans. To bestow a miter upon; raise to a rank to which the dignity of wearing a miter belongs, especially to episcopal rank.

More than at thy marchants other thy mitred bishop.
Piers Plowman (C), v. 103.

From such apostles, O ye mitred heads, Preserve the church! Cowper, Task, II. 342.

2. To ornament with a miter.

Your first essay was on your native laws,
Those having torn with ease and trampled down,
Your fangs you fasten'd on the mitred crown.
Druid, Hud and Panther, I. 202.

3. In carp., to join with a miter-joint; make a miter joint in. See miter-joint. — 4. In needle-work, to change the direction of, as a straight band, border, or the like, by cutting it at an abrupt angle, sacrificing a three-cornered piece, and bringing the cut edges together: a term derived from carpenter-work. — 5. In bookbinding, to join perfectly, as lines intended to meet at right angles. — Out and mitred string. See string. Mitred abbey or monastery, an abbey or monastery presided over by a mitred abbot.

The abbot received a ring, which, however, was not bestowed on any abbot unless his house were a mitred abbey.
Lock, Church of our Fathers, II. 104.

Mitred abbot, back, border, etc. See the nouns. II. intrans. In arch., to meet in a miter-joint. miter-block (mī'tēr-blok), n. In joinery, a block arranged for sawing pieces to an angle of 45°. E. H. Knight.

miter-board (mī'tēr-bōrd), n. A miter-box in which a piece is laid while the saw reciprocates between guides which cause it to make the kerf at the proscribed angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-box (mī'tēr-boks), n. In carp., a long narrow wooden box consisting of a bottom and two sides in which kerfs at an angle of 45° (or some other angle) are cut for the reception of a saw: used in cutting pieces of wood to form miter-joints. The piece of wood to be mitred is laid in the box, and the saw, being worked through the guide-ends in the vertical sides, cuts the wood to the necessary angle. (See miter-joint.) Another form consists of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests, and an adjustable guide for the saw, so that it admits of cutting at any required angle. In printing the name is given to a square channel of wood or iron having diagonal cuts in the sides, in which a saw can move freely in cutting pieces of wood or brass of uniform angles.

miter-cut (mī'tēr-kut), n. In glass-manuf., a groove cut in the surface of plate-glass for ornamentation. The cross-section of the groove or cut is very nearly an equilateral triangle.

miter-dovetail (mī'tēr-duy-tal), n. In joinery, a form of concealed dovetail presenting only a single joint-line, and that on the angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-drain (mī'tēr-dram), n. A drain laid within the metaling of roads, to convey the water to the side drains.

miter-flower (mī'tēr-flou'ēr), n. A plant of the genus Cyclamen.

miter-gage (mī'tēr-gāj), n. A gage for determining the angle of a miter-joint or bevel-joint for picture-frames, moldings, etc. E. H. Knight.

mitering-machine (mī'tēr-ing-mash'n), n. 1. In carp. and joinery, a machine for sawing or cutting to a true angle of 45° the ends of pieces to be joined, in order that they may be united by a miter-joint, or for cutting the pieces to any desired angle to make a bevel-joint. One form of this machine consists of a table with a circular saw and adjustable guides or fences; another consists of a bed and guide, with two blades at right angles, for making a downward cut, fixed at an angle of 45° to the guide and actuated by a lever. The latter form is used for mitering picture-frames and small moldings.

2. In printing, a mechanism of iron and steel, designed to cut the ends of metal rules with exact bevels and secure true joints at any angle. This is done in some machines by a saw, in others by a file or chisel.

miter-iron (mī'tēr-ī'رن), n. A fagot for forging composed of a group of bars of angular section wedged about a cylindrical bar within a hoop.

miter-jack (mī'tēr-jak), n. A simple form of miter-box or templet, consisting merely of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests. It is used for making miter-joints on small moldings.

miter-joint (mī'tēr-jōint), n. A joint in which the plane of the abutting surfaces bisects the angle (properly 90°) formed by the abutting pieces. Each of the abutting pieces is dressed to an angle of 45°; when they are dressed to an angle greater or less than 45° they are generally termed bevel-joints. When the angle formed by the junction of two parts is 45°, and the plane of division bisects this angle, the joint is sometimes called a half miter-joint. Also called miter.

miter-mushroom (mī'tēr-mush'rūm), n. A kind of mushroom of the genus Helvella, H. crispata; so named from the shape of the pileus. It grows in woods, and is delicate eating.

miter-plane (mī'tēr-plan), n. In carp.: (a) A plane in which the bit is set at an acute angle with the longitudinal axis of the stock. The effect of this arrangement is to give the action of the plane the character of a draw-cut. (b) A plane which runs in a race in angular relation to fences or gages, usually adjustable, by which the stuff to be planed is held to the action of the tool.

miter-post (mī'tēr-pōst), n. Same as meeting-post.

miter-shaped (mī'tēr-shap't), a. Having the shape of a miter: said especially of a form of head-dress worn by women in the middle of the fifteenth century.

miter-shell (mī'tēr-shel), n. The turreted shell of a mollusk of the genus Mitra or family Mitridae; a thara-shell. See cut under Mitra.

miter-sill (mī'tēr-sil), n. A raised step against which the foot of a canal-lock gate shuts on the floor of a lock-bay. E. H. Knight.

miter-square (mī'tēr-skwā), n. In carp., an immovable bevel for striking upon a piece of stuff an angle of 45°.

miter-valve (mī'tēr-valv), n. A valve of which the lid or plug is the frustum of a cone, the face of the seat being inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the valve.

miter-wheel (mī'tēr-hwel), n. 1. In mech., a particular kind of bevel-wheel, the bevel being limited to an angle of 45°, and the teeth of the wheel meshing with the teeth of another of the same bevel and diameter. The shafts of the wheels are at right angles with each other; and rotary motion in any plane is, by this mechanism, translated, without change of velocity, into motion in another plane at right angles with the first. Miter wheels are much used in mill work. See bevel wheel and bevel gear. 2. In glass-cutting, a wheel used for cutting a groove of triangular section.

miterwort (mī'tēr-wört), n. A name common to all plants of the genus Mitella. — False miterwort. See cockfoot and Tiarella.

miter, v. t. [ME. miten, < AS. mithan (= OS. mithan = OFries. for-mitha = OHG. mulan, MHG. mulen, G. mulen), avoid, conceal, refrain from, forbear, intr. lie concealed; see mist.] To avoid; conceal.

His sorrow he couthe ful wel mithe.
Boswell, I. 948.

mither (mī'tēr), n. A Scotch form of mother. mithic, a. An obsolete spelling of mythic.

Mithra, n. See Mithras.

Mithradatic (mith-rā-dat'ik), a. Same as Mithradate, 1.

Mithraeum (mith-rē'um), n. [NL. < L. Mithras, Mithras; see Mithras.] In Rom. antiq., a shrine or sanctuary of Mithras; usually an underground cell, grotto, or crypt in which the secret mysteries of Mithras were celebrated.

In the Mithraeum there were . . . there are still, because we have saved the place from destruction, and added it to the curiosities of Rome - the remnant of the seven torches . . . which were kept burning before the image of Mithras Taurictonus.
Lanciani, Anc. Rome in the Light of Mod. Discov., p. 192.

Mithraism (mith'ra-izm), n. [Mithras + -ism.] The worship of Mithras.

The religion of Mithra . . . played an important part in the thought of the early centuries of the Christian era, yet little is known of Mithraism at the present time.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 369.

Mithraist (mith'ra-ist), n. [Mithras + -ist.] A worshiper of Mithras.

This fact suggests a question . . . whether the Christians borrowed from the Mithraists, or the Mithraists from the Christians, or whether the coincidences are casual.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 369.

Mithraize (mith'ra-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Mithraized, ppr. Mithrasing. [Mithras + -ize.] To teach, profess, or practice Mithraic doctrines; observe the rites of Mithras.

Mithras, Mithra (mith'ras, mith'ri), n. [L. Mithras, Mithra, < Gr. Mithra, < OFers. Mitra = Skt. Mitra, lit. 'friend'.] 1. A deity of the ancient Persians, the god of light or of the sun, who came at last to be regarded as the ruler of both the material and the spiritual universes, and was worshiped with an elaborate ritual, with accompaniment of ceremonial mysteries. In this form his worship was adopted by the Romans under the early empire, and enjoyed great popularity. Representations of Mithras are common in Roman art, usually showing him as a youth in Oriental dress performing the mystic sacrifice of a bull. Sacred caves or grottoes were the regular seats of his worship.

They call upon no peculiar name of God, but only Mithras; in the which word they all agree together in one nature of the divine Majesty, whatsoever it be.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), II. 11.

The sacred grotto of Mithras, in the Campus Martius (Rome). . . . In the plot of ground which is now occupied by the Margnoli palace.

mitis-casting (mī'tis-kās'ting), n. The name given by P. Ostberg, the inventor of the process, to a method of increasing the fluidity and lowering the fusing-point of iron and steel, by adding a small quantity of aluminium (about half of one per cent.) to the charge in the crucible the moment it has been melted. This is said greatly to facilitate the casting process, and to add to the strength of the metal. The aluminium is added in the form of an alloy of 6 to 10 per cent. of that metal with iron. This alloy is made by a patented process consisting, as is stated, in adding clay to the iron in the process of smelting. The mitis-castings are said to be rapidly taking the place of malleable-iron castings.

mitis-green (mī'tis-grēn), n. Same as Paris green or Scheele's green. See *green*¹.

4. In chem., a blending of several ingredients without chemical alteration of the substances, each of which still retains its own nature and properties; distinguished from combination, in which the substances unite by chemical attraction, lose their distinct properties, and form a compound differing in its properties from any of the ingredients.—5. In organ-building, a flue-stop having two or more pipes to each digital, the pipes being so tuned as to give certain sets of the shriller harmonies of the fundamental tone of the digital; a compound stop. The stop is known as "of two ranks," "of three ranks," etc., according to the number of pipes to a digital. The harmonics chosen for reinforcement vary with the pitch of the fundamental tone, a low tone being provided with higher harmonics than a high one. The points in the compass where changes from one set of harmonics to another take place are called breaks. The harmonics usually chosen are those that lie at the intervals of fifths or octaves from the fundamental tone, rarely at those of thirds or sevenths. Mixtures serve two purposes: to enrich the total effect of heavy combinations by reinforcing the brilliant overtones of the harmony, and to emphasize the upper tones of heavy chords by reinforcing their nearest harmonics. They are never properly used except in combination with foundation-stops. Mixtures are variously named, as cornet, jar-

6. A cloth of variegated or mottled coloring, usually of sober tints.—7. In printing, type-setting that calls for the use of three or more distinct faces or faces and bodies of type. [Eng.]—8. Same as krasis.—Brown mixture. See Brown.—Degrating mixture. See Degrating.

Also called Oxford gray, paper-and-silk, and thunder-and-lightning.—Prince's mixture, a dark kind of mud scented with oil of roses. Rules of mixtures. Same as allegation, 2. —Byn. 2. Mixture, Miscellany, Mosley, Perrigo, Hotchpotch, Jumble; variety, diversity. Mixture is a general term denoting a compound of two or more ingredients, more often, but not necessarily, congruous. Miscellany is a collection of things not closely connected, but brought together by rational design: "A miscellany has the diversity without the incongruity of a mosley." (C. J. Smith, Syn. Disc., p. 304.) Specifically, a miscellany is a collection of independent literary pieces, the unity lying only in their general character. A mosley is a mixture or collection of things distinctly incongruous; the word has the specific sense of a song or tune made up of scraps of other songs or tunes ingeniously and amusingly fitted together. Perrigo emphasizes the confusion or indistinctness of the mixture or collection. It is applied chiefly to printed or spoken discourse. Hotchpotch is a still more energetic expression of the confusion of the collection, the idea being drawn from the boiling together of scraps of all sorts of food. Jumble implies the idea of a heap turned over and over till everything is hopelessly mixed. The figurative uses correspond essentially to the literal.

Pure from passion's mixture rude,

Ever to have earth allied. Lowell, Comm. Ode.

The world lies no longer a dull miscellany and lumber-room, but has form and order.

Rueter, Misc., p. 34.

one species, M. varia, the common black-and-white creeper of the United States. The bill and feet are black. The entire plumage is streaked and spotted with black and white. This bird abounds in woodland, and has the habits of a creeper rather than of a warbler. The nest, placed on the ground or on a stump or log, is built of moss, bark-strips, grass, leaves, hair, etc.; the eggs are 4 or 5 in number and white in color, profusely speckled with reddish.

Mniotiltæ (mī-ō-tīl'-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Mniotilta + -æ.] A restricted section of Sylviidae; the creeping warblers proper of the genera Mniotilta, Parula, and Protonotaria. S. F. Baird, 1858.

Mniotiltidæ (mī-ō-tīl'-tī-de), n. pl. [NL., < Mniotilta + -idæ.] An extensive family of oscine passerine birds, named from the genus Mniotilta, formerly often called Sylvioidæ; the American warblers. They have 9 primaries, 12 rectrices, scutellate tail, and a moderate bill usually notched and furnished with denticulations. There are many genera and upward of 100 species, all confined to America. They are small and usually prettily colored birds of the woodland, all insectivorous and in temperate and cold regions migratory. They abound in species and individuals in eastern portions of the United States, where they form a very characteristic feature of the avifauna. Leading genera in that country are Dendroica, Mniotilta, Parula (or Compsothlypis), Protonotaria, Helminthophila, Helminthophila, Geothlypis, Icteria, Myiobites, and Setophaga. The family is usually divided into 3 subfamilies: Mniotiltinae (or Sylvioidinae), Icteriinae (or Geothlypinae), and Setophaginae, or the wood warblers, ground warblers, and fly-catching warblers respectively. Also called Dendroica.

II. a. Pertaining to Moab or the Moabites.
— Moabite stone, a slab of black basalt bearing an inscription of thirty four lines in Hebrew Phœnician characters, the oldest monument of the Semitic alphabet. It was found in 1848 at the ancient Elmon of Moab. Before it could be removed it was broken in many pieces, through the jealousies of Arab tribes, but a squere of the inscription had been previously taken, and the chief fragments are now in the Louvre Museum. The stone is the most important surviving relic of Moabite civilization, and is believed to date from about 900 B. C. The inscription records the victories of King Mesha over the Israelites.

mocking-bird (mók'ing-bérđ), n. An oscine passerine bird of the subfamily Mimicæ and restricted genus Mimus; a mock-bird or mocker.

The best-known species is M. polyglottus, which abounds in the southern parts of the United States; it is the most famous songster of America, and is much prized as a cage-bird.

Its proper song is of remarkable compass and variety, and besides this the bird has a wonderful range, being able to imitate almost any voice or even mere noises. This vocalization is confined to the male. The bird is about 10 inches long and 14 in extent of wings. It is ash-gray above, mottled-white below; the bill and feet are blackish; the wing and tail feathers in part pure white. The extent of this white on the wings and tail distinguishes the sexes.

modi, n. A Middle English form of mood!

mod. An abbreviation (a) of modern; (b) in music, of moderato.

modal (mō'dal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. modal = It. modale, < ML. modalis, pertaining to a mode, < L. modus, mode: see mode!]. 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or affected by a mode; relating to the mode or manner, and not to the substance.

When we speak of faculties of the soul, we assert not with the schools their real distinction from it, but only a modal diversity. Glazelle, Vanity of Dogmatizing, iii.

Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to a grammatical mode.

Other verb-phrases of a modal meaning, are made with the auxiliary verbs may, can, must, and ought.

Whitney, Essentials of Eng. Grammar, ¶ 261.

All these adjectives which have a modal secondary force are future.

Amer. Jour. Philol., x. 40.

Modal abstraction, the fixing of the attention upon one particular mode of the object of imagination, to the neglect of the others: opposed to partial abstraction, by which, for example, we may think of the head of an animal without thinking of the rest of the body.—Modal categorization, the categorization of the composition of an object with one of those modes which are in their own nature distinguished from the rest.—Modal distinction, a distinction by which one and the same thing is distinguished from itself by its possession of diverse modes, as the distinction of Philip drunk from Philip sober; a formalistic phrase.—Modal enumeration, see enumeration.—Modal identity, either the absence of modal distinction, or the identity of a mode of things which may be really distinct.—Modal proposition, a proposition in which the predicate is affirmed of the subject under some qualification: but the term is almost always confined to propositions in which some fact is said to be possible, contingent, necessary, or impossible.—Modal syllogism, a syllogism one of whose premises is a modal proposition.

II. a. A modal proposition.

Their characteristic property as modes belongs to form rather than to matter; and Aristotle ought not to be considered as unphilosophical for introducing them into the Organon.

Grice, Aristotle, iv.

Conjunct modal. See conjunct.—Disjunct modal. See disjunct.

modalism (mō'dal-izm), n. [< modal + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine, adopted by Sabellius in the third century, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are different manifestations of one and the same person.

The orthodox doctrine of the Trinity stands between tritheism and modalism, now leaning to the one, now to the other, when either the tripersonality or the unity is emphasized.

P. Schaef, Christ and Christianity, p. 68.

modalist (mō'dal-ist), n. [< modal + -ist.] In theol., one who holds or professes modalism.

modalistic (mō-dal-ist'ik), a. [< modalist + -ic.] In theol., of or pertaining to modalism.

The presbyter Hippolytus was successful in convincing the leaders of that church that the Modalistic doctrine, taken in its strictness, was contrary to Scripture.

Harnack, Encyc. Brit., XXI. 127.

modality (mō-dal'i-ti), n.; pl. modalities (-tiz). [= F. modalité = Pg. modalidade = It. modalità, < ML. modalitas (-s), < modus, modal: see modal!]. 1. The fact of being a mode.—2. A determination of an accident; a mode.

These excellencies are of more real and eternal worth than the angelical manner of moving so in an instant, and those other forms and modalities of their knowledge and volition.

Jos. Taylor, Works (ed. 1886), II. 104.

3. Mode in the logical sense; that wherein problematical, assertoric, and apodictic judgments are distinguished.

Lastly, under the head of Modality, we have seen that all phenomena, as objects, are in themselves contingent, or only hypothetically necessary, i. e. necessary on the presupposition of the existence of something else.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 164.

Just as the adjectives which contain the modal force of possibility can lose this modality, so also certain adjectives can assume the same, although the modality was not originally in them.

Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 44.

4. In civil law, the quality of being limited as to time or place of performance, or, more loosely, of being suspended by a condition: said of a promise.—5. Same as modalism.

To object that the faith in the Holy Trinity obliges us to create a difficulty as the Pontifical modalist ivory trifling, since that is only matter of belief indefinite. We are not required to explain the manner of the mystic.

Bryson, To Rev. Father Patrick.

Adverbial modality. See adverbial.—Categories of modality. See category, 1.

modally (mō'dal-i), adv. In a modal manner; in a manner or relation expressing or indicating a mode or form; as regards mode or manner.

mode! (mōd'), n. [Also, in grammar, logic, and music, mood; also, as mere L., modus; in ME. mode (def. 8), *< OE. moed, mauf, later mode. F. mode, manner, way, mode, style, fashion, = Sp. Pg. It. modo, manner, mode (also Sp. Pg. It. moda, L., fashion, < F.) (< F. D. mode = G. Modus = Sw. Dan. modus, in grammar, < L.) < L. modus, measure, due measure, rhythm, melody, etc., manner, way, mode, mode in grammar, etc.; akin to E. metel. The form moed, as used, along with mode, in grammar, music, and logic, is prob. due in part to some confusion with mood! as if 'an attitude of mind'.] 1. A manner of acting or doing; way of performing or effecting anything; method; way.

A table richly spread in regal mode

Milton, P. R., II. 840

What modes of sight between each wide extreme!

Pope, Essay on Man, I. 211

Ring in the nobler modes of life,

With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvl

2. Customary manner; prevailing style; fashion.

It was grown a Mode to be vicious, and they had rather be damned than be out of the fashion.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. xii.

To White Hall, and in the garden spoke to my Lord Sandwich, who in his gold-limbed suit, as the mode is, and looks nobly.

Pope's Diary, II. 8.

If after this we look on the people of mode in the country, we find in them the manners of the last age.

Addison, Country Manners.

3. In gram., the designation, by the form of the verb, of the manner of our conception of an event or fact, whether as certain, contingent, possible, desirable, or the like. The modes of the English verb are the indicative, subjunctive, and imperative; and other verbal phrases are usually called by the name of mode, as potential, conditional, and so on. See these terms. Also commonly, but less properly, mod.

4. The natural disposition or the manner of existence or action of anything; a form; as, heat is a mode of motion; reflection is a mode of consciousness.

There is something in things which neither is the thing itself, nor another thing, nor yet nothing, but a certain medium betwixt them both. And this used to be called a mode: for example, A degree of quality is not quality, nor yet is it wholly nothing, but a mode.

Burke, Philos. of a Gentleman.

A mode is the manner of existence of a thing. Take for example, a piece of wax. The wax may be round or square or of any other definite figure; it may also be solid or fluid. Its existence in any of these modes is not essential: it may change from one to another without any substantial alteration. As the mode cannot exist without a substance, we can accord to it only a secondary or precarious existence in relation to the substance, to which we accord the privilege of existing by itself, per se, exterior; but though the substance be not attracted to any particular mode of existence, we must not suppose that it can exist, or at least be conceived by us to exist, in none. All modes are therefore variable states, and though some mode is necessary for the existence of a thing, any individual mode is accidental.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

I am . . . assured that those modes of consciousness which I call perceptions and imaginations, in as far only as they are modes of consciousness, exist in me.

Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Veitch), III.

Where the substantiality of God, as the "highest monad," is insisted on, the finite monads become mere modes of his existence.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 82.

That mode or process of the Moral Faculty which we call conscience. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 841.

5. A combination of ideas. See the quotations.

Modes I call such complex ideas, which, however compounded, contain not in them the supposition of subsisting by themselves, but are considered as dependencies on or affections of substances.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 14.

There are some modes which are only variations or different combinations of the same simple ideas, . . . as a dozen, or score; which are nothing but the ideas of so many distinct units added together; and these I call simple modes, as being contained within the bounds of one simple idea.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 6.

Combinations of simple ideas of different kinds I have called "mixed modes."

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 6.

6. In logic: (a) A modification or determination of a proposition with reference to possibility and necessity. (b) A variety of syllogism. See mood! 7. The more usual but less proper form.

Tindal would be fayne wit in what figure it is made; he shal finde in the first figure and in the third mode.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 604.

(c) The consignification of a part of speech. (d) An accidental determination.—7. In music:

(a) A species or form of scale; a method of dividing the interval of the octave for melodic purposes; an arrangement of tones within an octave at certain fixed intervals from each other. Three great systems of modes are to be distinguished—the ancient Greek, the Gregorian, medieval, or ecclesiastical, and the modern. These three were successively derived from each other, but with noteworthy changes of both principle and nomenclature. (1) In the Greek system each mode consisted of two tetrachords (two whole steps and one half-step in each) plus one whole step (the diatonic tone). The nature and the name of the mode varied according to the tetrachord used as a basis and according to the position of the diatonic tone, or, in other words, according to the relative order of the whole steps and half-steps. When the diatonic tone lay between the two component tetrachords, the mode was named simply from the tetrachord used—the mode containing Dorian tetrachords was called Dorian or Doric, etc.; but when it lay below or above both of them, the prefixes hypo- and hyper- respectively were added, as Hypodorian, Hyperdorian, etc. Below is a table of the nine original modes, reckoned upward, the whole steps being indicated by —, the half-steps by v, the constituent tetrachords by —v—, and the diatonic tone by +.

I. Dorian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
II. Phrygian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
III. Lydian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
IV. Hypodorian, or Aolian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
V. Hypophrygian, Ionian, or Ionian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
VI. Hypolydian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—
VII. Hyperdorian, or Mixolydian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—

IX. Hyperlydian,	—v—+—v—+—v—+—v—

These modes were embodied in scales of about two octaves, sometimes called transposing scales, which were more or less susceptible of transposition. By the later theorists fifteen such scales were recognized, each derived from one of the foregoing modes, and beginning at a different pitch, each a half-step higher than the preceding. These scales, though not always differing from each other in mode, but only in relative pitch, were also called modes, and were named like the modes themselves. Assuming the lowest

That which modulates or varies. See modulate, v. t., 2.

In modern English verse alliteration only plays the subordinate part of a modulant, not to be unduly decried where not overdone.

R. Wadham, Eng. Versification, p. 110.

modular (mod'ū-lār), a. [= F. modulaire; an module + -ar.] Pertaining to modulation; pertaining to or regulated by a module or a modulus. Modular equation. See equation. Modular focus, a focus of a conoid or quadric surface. "The distance of any point on the quadric from such a focus is in a constant ratio to its distance from the corresponding directrix, the latter distance being measured parallel to either of the planes of circular section." (Salmagundi.) Modular function, a higher periodic function connected with a group of periods.

where a, b, c, d are integers. Modular method of generation of quadrics, a method based on the fundamental property of the modular function. Modular numbers, in Landen's transformation, numbers approximating to the value of the new modulus. They are the successive approximations in the process of finding the arithmetico-geometrical mean of the old complementary modulus and unity. Modular ratio, the modulus of a system of logarithms. See logarithm. Modular transformation of an elliptic integral, a transformation of the elliptic integral into another with a different modulus.

modulate (mod'ū-lāt), v. t. pret. and pp. modulated, modulating. [L. modulatus, pp. of modulus, measure, regulate, modulate, < modulus, measure; see modulus.] (F. module, v.) I. trans. 1. To modify; adjust; adapt; regulate.

With the gift of song Carlyle would have been the greatest of epic poets since Homer. Without it, to modulate and harmonize and bring parts into their proper relation, he is the most anonymous of humdrums, the most shining avatar of whom the world has ever seen.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 148.

2. To vary or inflect the sound or utterance of, especially so as to give expressiveness to what is uttered; vary or adapt in tone.

In all vocal music it [the tongue] helps the wind pipe to modulate the sounds.

N. Green, Comologia Sacra, I. v. 16.

He listened to the voice of nature, and modulated his own into it.

Stearns, Fribourg Shandy, v. 3.

Calus Gracchus, it is said, when he harangued the Roman populace, modulated his tone by an oratorical flute or pitch-pipe.

Levin, Kuckelbocker, p. 215.

We are conscious of a murmuring humble voice; it is a beggar, who is modulating a prayer for alms and bowing audaciously.

Harpur, Mac, LXXIX, 380.

3. To vary the pitch of; inflect; melodize.

The master's hand, in modulated air,

Hids the loud organ breathe.

Sumner, The Chase, III.

He [Gluck] is to play on a set of drinking-glasses, which he modulates with water.

Walden, Letters, II. 14.

4. In music, to change from one key (tonality) to another, by utilizing one or more of the tones common to both.

II. intrans. 1. In music, to pass from one key (tonality) into another, or from the major into the minor mode, or vice versa. See modulation, 3 (b). Hence—2. To vary, oscillate, or fluctuate. [Rare.]

It is written from no well defined standpoint, but modulates from illustrations of the Rochester experimenters to the telepathic drawings of the English society for psychic research, and thence to the localization diagrams of Ferrier, with no clear method.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 516.

modulation (mod'ū-lā'shon), n. [F. modulation = Sp. modulación = Pg. modulação = It. modulazione, < L. modulatio (n.), < modulari, regulate, modulate; see modulate.] 1. The act of modulating. (a) The act of modifying, adjusting, or adapting.

The emperours . . . delited in dauncyng, perceyning therein to be a perfect measure, whiche maye be called modulation.

Str. T. Elph, The Governour, I. 20.

When we fix ourselves upon the meditation and modulation of the mercy of God, even his judgments cannot put us out of tune, but we shall sing and be cheerful even in them.

Donne, Sermons, II.

(b) The act of inflecting the voice or any instrument in a musical manner.

The rings of the wind pipe are fitted for the modulation of the voice.

N. Green, Comologia Sacra, I. v. 10.

(c) The modification of the voice or of utterance to express various shades of meaning or emotion.

The poets of Elizabeth had attained an art of modulation which was afterwards neglected and forgotten.

Johnson, Waller.

2. A state or condition reached by a process of modulating, modifying, or varying.

That delicate modulation of surface treatment which gives high value to the best Florentine metal work.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 124.

3. (a) In Gregorian music, one of the tones in a mode with which every phrase of a melody in that mode must begin and end. The regular modulations of each mode include the final, the dominant, the mediant, and the participant, each of which has its own peculiar functions. (See these words, and also mode.) To these are added two other tones in each mode, called conceded modulations, which are of minor importance. (b) In mod. music, the act, process, or result of changing, in the course of a piece, from one key (tonality) to another, so that a new tone becomes the key-note and the relative significance of all the tones common to both tonalities is altered. When a tone foreign to the original tonality of a piece is used, a modulatory effect is nearly always produced. If this effect is carried out into a cadence in the new key, the modulation is called final; otherwise it is passing or transient. All modulations, however, require a return to the original key before the end of the piece. The tone by which the transition is introduced or effected is called the note of modulation; this tone in the simpler forms of modulation is usually the fourth or the seventh tone of the new key. The simplicity of a modulation depends upon the closeness of relationship between the keys involved. The simplest modulations are into the keys either of the dominant or of the subdominant, and are effected by sharpening the fourth tone or flattening the seventh tone respectively of the original key. Modulations into the relative minor or into the minor keys of the supertonic or of the mediant are effected by sharpening the fifth, the first, or the second tone of the original key respectively. Numerous other more intricate modulations are possible, especially in instrumental music. A modulation is abrupt, distant, or extraneous when it leads into a key not closely related with the original one. It is deceptive when it utilizes a series of chords in an unusual and startling way. It is modic when produced by the introduction of a tone foreign to the original tonality, and harmonic when produced by the use of a chord common to both tonalities first in its relation to one and then in that to the other. It is enharmonic when it is effected on an instrument of fixed intonation, like the pianoforte, by calling a key (diatonic) first by one name and then by another, as when \sharp in the key of B is called \sharp in the key of C. Modulation is one of the most important resources of modern music. It introduces endless variety of both melodic and harmonic effect, with great possibilities in the way of sequences and imitations. It increases the unit of composition and the importance of the original tonal relations, with a subsequent complete and emphatic resumption of them. It affords means for the expression of very complex emotional conditions, particularly those of unrest, contrast, etc. In the style of Wagner it has often been pushed to the limit of toleration, so as almost to destroy that sense of fixed tonality which is the basis of musical certitude. The most remarkable harmonic convenience for modulation, at least in instrumental music, is a chord of four tones consisting of three minor thirds successively superposed, which is called the chord of the diminished seventh. This chord may be regarded as based upon any one of its four tones, which is then the seventh tone of either a major or a minor scale. Its harmonic nature is therefore peculiarly ambiguous and unstable. (c) A musical composition exemplifying modulation.—4. Sound modulated; melody.

Innumerable songsters, in the freshening shade of new-spring leaves, their modulations mix Mellifluous.

Thomson, Spring, I. 60.

5. In arch., the proportion of the different parts of an order according to a module. — Syn. 1 (b), acrotia, etc. See acrotia.

modulator (mod'ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. modulateur = Sp. modulador = It. modulatore, < L. modulari, a regulator, director, < modulari, regulate; see modulate.] 1. One who or that which modulates.

What a variety of uses hath nature laid upon that one member, the tongue, the grand instrument of taste, the faithful judge, the centinel, the watchman of all our nourishment, the artful modulator of our voice!

Derham, Physico-Theology, v. 2.

2. A chart of the musical scale, indicating the relations of its essential tones to each other and of the whole scale to its related scales. The form of modulator generally used in the tonic sol-fa system of teaching music is shown in the accompanying chart.

modulatory (mod'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [F. modulateur + -ory.] Of or pertaining to modulation.

Modulations are really governed by the same laws which apply to any succession of harmonies whatsoever, and the possibilities of modulatory device are in the end chiefly dependant upon intelligible order in the progression of the parts.

Grove's Dict. Music, II. 345.

module (mod'ū-l), n. [F. module = Sp. módulo = Pg. l. modulo, a measure, module, < L. modulus, a small measure, a measure, mode, meter, dim. of modus, measure; see model. Cf. modulus, model, mod.] 1. A little measure; hence, a small quantity.—2. In arch., a standard of measure often taken, particularly in antiquity and the middle ages, to regulate the proportions of an order or the disposition of an entire building. In the classical styles the diameter or semidiameter of the column at the base of the shaft is usually selected as the module, and this is subdivided into parts or minutes, the diameter generally into sixty or the semidiameter into thirty. Some architects employ no fixed number of divisions of the module, but divide it into as many parts as they deem serviceable for the work in hand.

3. A model or representation; a mold; a pattern.

Among so many Modules admirable, Th' adorned beauties of the King of creatures, Com, com, and see the Woman's rapt features.

Spectator, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 4.

4. In numis., the size of a coin or medal, measured by the diameter. [Rare.]

modulet (mod'ū-l), v. t. [F. modulet = Sp. Pg. modular = It. modulare, modulare, modulate; see modulate.] 1. To model; shape.

O, would I could my father's cunning use, And souls into well moduled clay infuse.

Sandys, Orvid (1638), p. 10. (Latham.)

2. To modulate.

That charmer of the Night, . . . That modulated her tunes so admirably rare, As man to act in parts at first had learn'd of her.

Drayton, Polyolbon, III. 70.

modulett (mod'ū-lēt), n. [F. modulet + -et.] A small model; a microcosm.

But soft, my Muse: what wilt thou re-repeat The Little-Muse admired Modulet?

Spectator, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 7.

Modulidae (mō-dū-lī-dē), n. pl. [Nl., < Modulus + -idae.] A family of tenebrionid rostriferous gastropods represented by the genus Modulus. The animal has a radula like that of the Cerithiidae, but has no siphon, and the shell is holostomatous and trochiform, but with a columellar tooth. The species are inhabitants of tropical seas, and one, Modulus lectum, is abundant in the West Indies.

modulize (mod'ū-līz), v. t. [F. module + -ize.] To model.

While with the Duke, th' Eternal did deuce, And to his inward sight did modulize His Tabernacle's admirable Form.

Spectator, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Laws.

modulus (mod'ū-lus), n. [L. modulus, a measure, dim. of modus, measure; see model, model.] 1. In math., a real positive number that serves as measure or parameter of a function or effect. Represented by M or μ .—2. In physics, the measure of an effect under conditions whose measure is unity. Thus, a physical modulus is not a number, but a physical quantity.—3. [cop.] In conch., a genus of gastropods, referred to the Littorinidae or periwinkles, or made type of the family Modulidae. The shell is depressed and trochiform, with a deeply cut columellar tooth and many-whorled operculum.—Absolute modulus of gravitation, the acceleration due to the gravitation of a body toward a mass of one gram at a distance of one centimeter. It amounts to 648×10^{-10} centimeters per second.—Angle of the modulus, in math., the angle of which the modulus is the sine.—Complementary modulus, in math., the cosine of the angle of the modulus.—Gravity-modulus in physics, a modulus of elasticity in which the weight of a unit mass is taken as the unit of force.—Length of modulus, in physics, a modulus of elasticity expressed in a length by taking the weight of the unit volume of the material referred to as the unit of force.—Modulus of a congruence, in math., that measure or divisor which gives equal remainder when the two congruent numbers are divided by 2, this constituting the congruence. Thus 23 is congruent to 3 the modulus being 7; and this is written by Gauss and others $23 \equiv 3 \pmod{7}$. — Modulus of a linear transformation, in math., the square of the determinant of the matrix of transformation — that is, if the transformation takes place according to the equations

then the modulus of transformation is $$\begin{vmatrix}a_1' & b_1' & c_1' \\a_2' & b_2' & c_2' \\a_3' & b_3' & c_3'\end{vmatrix}^2$$

Modulus of a machine, the ratio of the load to the power in equilibrium. — Modulus of a matrix, in math., the determinant of the matrix, this having the same constituents arranged in the same way. — Modulus of an elliptic integral, differential, or function, in math., that positive number less than unity the square of which multiplies the square of the sine of the amplitude or variable angle in the delta or square root which enters into the expression of such a quantity. — Modulus of an imaginary, in math., that real positive number which multiplied by a root of unity gives the imaginary. — Modulus of a system of logarithms, in math., see logarithm. — Modulus of elasticity, in physics, in its general sense, the quantity of elasticity or the ratio of a stress to the strain that occasions it; but applied by older and less careful writers to Young's modulus (named after its inventor, Dr. Thomas Young, a celebrated English physicist (1773-1829), which is the pressure or tension on the end of a bar per unit of section divided by the compression or elongation per unit of length so produced. See elasticity. — Modulus of gravitation, in astron., the square root of the component acceleration due to gravitation of any body toward the sun at a distance equal to the mean distance of the earth. See absolute modulus, above. — Modulus of propulsion. See this quotation.

As 100 cubic inches of cylinder capacity are needed to move an engine with 20 tons adhesive weight one inch, if we divide 100 by 20 we will get the cylinder capacity needed for each ton. That is, $100 \div 20 = 5$ cubic in. cylinder capacity per ton (of 2,000 lbs.) of adhesive weight is needed to move any locomotive one inch. This quantity we have named the modulus of propulsion.
Furney, Locomotive, p. 416.

Quadratic modulus, in math., the square of the determinant. — Young's modulus. See modulus of elasticity, above.

modus (mō'dus), n. [L. modus, manner, mode; see modul.] 1. Manner; mode; same as modul 1.

We are not to hope that the modus of it should fall, or be comprehended, under human enquiry.
Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expt.

The same evangelical power did institute that calling, for the modus of whose election it took such particular order.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II, 164.

2. In Rom. and civil law, and early Eng. law, the manner or qualifying terms of a gift or disposition of property. The introduction of writing as the instrument of gift or transfer enabled donors to vary the customary legal consequences by expressing an intent as to the manner or mode in which the act should have effect; and that part of the instrument which thus qualified what otherwise would have been the ordinary legal effect was termed the modus, and the same term was used to designate the legal qualification thus imposed. Hence, more specifically: (a) The clause in a will or other gift (and the legal obligation created thereby) by which the donor charged an obligation upon the legatee or donee, not as a condition the breach of which would create a forfeiture, but as a personal obligation, which the legatee would assume by accepting the gift. (b) Also, in early Eng. law, the clause in a conveyance enlarging or restricting the estate which otherwise would be granted by it, as for instance by giving to the donee and his heirs, or his heirs and assigns, or by giving to the donee and only a specified class of heirs. Hence the old common law maxim modus est cunctis vinculis legum et modus legem dat donationem, requiring specific qualification and express agreement override the law, or give the law to the transfer. (c) In eccl. law, the exemption, or partial exemption, from the payment of tithes, termed modus decemendi and modus non decemendi respectively.

One terrible circumstance of this bill is turning the tithe of flax and hemp into what the lawyers call a modus, or a certain sum in lieu of a tenth part of the product. Swift.

A tithe of turf and a tithe of furze had been lately introduced, and certain moduses or compositions, which had elsewhere been substituted for other tithes, were in this province [Munster] unknown.
Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

Modus operandi, a plan or mode of working. — Modus ponens, in logic, inference from a hypothetical proposition and the truth of the antecedent to the truth of the consequent; as, If I am bad, I deserve punishment; I am bad, hence I deserve punishment. — Modus tollens, in logic, the inference from a hypothetical proposition and the falsity of the consequent to the falsity of the antecedent; as, If I were to jump out of the window, I should break my neck; now I won't break my neck, hence I shan't jump out of the window. — Modus vivendi, a manner or way of living; a temporary arrangement pending a settlement of matters in debate, as between two nations.

modwall (mod'wā), n. [Also mudwall, mid-wall; origin obscure.] The bee-eater, Merope apiaster. [Local, British.]

mody (mō'di), a. [modul + -y.] Fashionable; modish.

Mr. Longman, you make me too rich and too mody.
Richardson, Pamela, I, 128. (Davies.)

mody, a. An obsolete form of mody.

moel, a. and adv. See ma.

moel, a. and c. An obsolete form of moor.

moel, a. and n. Same as moel.

moellon (mō'el-lōn), n. [F., < OF. moillon, moylon, broken stone, rubble, cf. mollon, morlon, middle, center, < moelle, marrow, pith, = Sp. muello = Pg. medulla = It. midollo, < L. medulla, marrow, pith, crumba, < medius, middle. Cf. OF. moye, mote, the soft part of stone, < L. media, fem. of medius, middle; see medium. Cf. moety.] Rubble-stone, sometimes used in architecture, set in mortar, for such uses as filling between the facing-walls of a structure or in the spandrels of a bridge.

moerology (mō'rol-ō-jī), n. [Gr. moira, part, lot, fate, + -logia, < logos, speak; see -ology.] The practice or art of professional mourning.

Moesogoth (mō'sō-gōth), n. [NL. (ML. ?) Mosogoth, pl., < L. Mosi, Gr. Mosoi, Moioi, a people of Thrace, L. Masia, Gr. Mosia, Moia (Mioia & iv Epiros, Mysia in Europe, in distinction from Mysia in Asia Minor), their country (see def.), + Gothic, Gr. Gothi, Goths; see Goth.] One of those Goths who settled in Moesia, a Roman province north of the Balkans, south of the Danube, and east of Illyria, and there, under the protection of the Roman emperors, devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits. The Moesogoths were converted to Christianity in the 4th century. See Goth.

Moesogothic (mō'sō-gōth'ik), a. and n. [NL. Mosogothicus, < Mosogoth, the Moesogoths; see Mosogoth.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Moesogoths or their language. 2. n. The language of the Moesogoths. See Gothic, n.

moet, c. An obsolete form of move.

moette (mō'et'), n. [= Sp. moetta, < It. (dial.) moietta, < L. mephitis, a noxious exhalation; see mephitic.] An irrespirable gas escaping from the earth; a gas-spring. It is sometimes (although rarely) applied by writers in English to carbonic-acid gas escaping from the rocks in regions of nearly extinct volcanism, and, by extension, to the openings from which this gas escapes. The moettes are analogous to the soffioni or "blow-holes," but betoken a still further advance of the region toward complete extinction of the volcanic forces.

moftle (mof'tl), v. i.; pret. and pp. moffled, ppr. moffling. [Freq. of moff (?). Cf. muffle.] To do anything clumsily or ineffectually; botch, Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] moftail (mō-fū'ail), n. [Hind. moftail, the country as distinguished from the town, lit. separate, < Ar. fūsalā, separate, fasalā, cut, cut out, detail.] In India, the country stations and districts as distinguished from the residences; or, in a district, the rural localities as distinguished from a station or official residency; the country as distinguished from towns. A whiff of freshness and fragrance from the moftail will be as the mangoes and the doliars.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 308.

mog, v. i. See mug 2.

mog 2 (mog), v. i.; pret. and pp. mogged, ppr. mogging. [Origin obscure.] To move away. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

Mogadore gum. Same as Barbary gum (which see, under gum 2).

Mogdad coffee. See coffee.

moggan (mog'an), n. [Gael. and Ir. moggan.] A footless stocking. [Scotch.]

mogilalla (mō-jī-lā'li-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. mogilalla, hardly speaking, < mogil, hardly, + alla, talk, prattle.] In pathol., stammering speech.

Mograbian (mō-grā'bi-an), a. and n. [Ar. and Turk. Moghrab, Mograb (see Moghrab), + -ian.] Same as Moghrabin.

Moghrabin (mō'grā-bin), a. and n. [Also Moghrabin, Moghrabin, Moghrabin (?), Moghrabin; < Ar. Turk. Moghrabi, < Moghrab, Mograb (see def.). Cf. Moghrabin.] 1. a. Relating to Moghrab, a region in northern Africa, regarded as nearly equivalent to the coast-region of Morocco and Algeria. 2. n. An inhabitant of Moghrab.

My proper name is only known to my brethren. The men beyond our tents call me Hayradin Moghrabin — that is, Hayradin the African Moor.
Scott, Quentin Durward, xvi.

Mogul (mō-gul'), n. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. Mogol = Ar. Moghul = Pers. Moghol, Mughal = Turk. Mughul, < Hind. Mughal, < Mongolian Mongol, Mongol; see Mongol.] 1. n. 1. A Mongolian Mongolian; specifically, in hist., one of the followers of Baber, conqueror of Hindustan in the sixteenth century. — 2. A name for the best quality of playing-cards. — Mogul engine. See engine. — The Great Mogul. (a) The common designation among Europeans of the sovereign of the so-called Mogul empire, or empire of Delhi, at one time including most of Hindustan, established by Baber about 1526, and brought under British control in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the last nominal emperor being deposed in 1857. Also called simply the Mogul. King, poet, priest, the Mogul was in the good Mahomedan what a descendant of the House of David would be to a nation of Jews. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II, 68. Hence — (b) Any great personage.

II. a. Of or relating to the Moguls, or the Mongol empire in India: as, the Mogul language; the Mogul dynasty. — Mogul architecture, the style of Mohammedan architecture evolved and carried out by the Mogul emperors in India, from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. The period was one of lavish expenditure in building, and innumerable mosques, royal tombs, and palaces testify to its artistic originality, to its excellent use of both arched and columnar construction and of the dome, characteristically of bulbous form, and to the delivery and good taste of its decorations in carving and in inlaying with precious stones. The arches are usually pointed, and as a rule resemble in outline the so-called Tudor arch. Minarets and especially small pavilions covered with domical roofs, either surrounding a large dome or placed in great numbers at the angles or along the parapets of the cupings of palaces, are other characteristic features.

Moguntine (mō-gun'tin), n. [L. Moguntia, also Moguntiacum, Mayontiacum, Mayontianus, the ancient name of the city now called in G. Mainz, sometimes Meinz, in F. Mayence.] Of or pertaining to Mainz, a city at the junction of the Rhine and the Main.

moha (mō'hā), n. The grass Setaria Italica, or Italian millet.

Mogul Architecture.—The Taj Mahal, Agra, India.

mohair (mō'hār), n. and a. [Formerly also mohaire; < OF. mohaire, mouaire, mohere, F. moire (> E. moire, U. mohr, moire = Pr. moire = Sp. moire, muer, mud = Pg. moire = It. moire), mohair; cf. It. moirajo, haircloth; prob. < Ar. mukhayyar, a fabric of goat's hair, a kind of caudex.] 1. n. 1. The hair of the Angora goat, a native of Asia Minor. — 2. A kind of fine caudex made of such hair, sometimes watered (see moire); also, an imitation of the real mohair made of wool and cotton, much used for women's dress.

Cloth of Wool, Kariak, Mohaire, Chamlets, and all sorts of Silk.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 372.

She, . . . when she sees her friend in deep despair, observes how much a chinat exceeds mohair!

Pope, Moral Essays, II, 170.

Mohair glacé, a French dress-goods made of cotton and goat's hair.

II. a. Made of mohair; as, a mohair cloak. — Mohair braid, worsted braid used for binding garments.

Mohair luster, a black dress-goods of cotton and mohair. It has some resemblance to alpaca.

mohair-shell (mō'hār-shel), n. In conch., a certain species of Voluta, of a closely and finely reticulated texture, having a resemblance to mohair.

Mohamedan, a. and n. An obsolete form of Mohammedan.

Mohammedan (mō-ham'e-dan), a. and n. [Also Mohammadan, Muhammadan (also Mahomedan, Mahometan, q. v.) (= D. Mohamedaan = G. Mohamedaner = Sw. Mohammedan, Muhammadan = Dan. Muhammedaner = Hind. Muhammadī), < Mohammed, < Ar. Muhammad, a man's name, lit. "praised," < hamada, praise. From the Ar. Muhammad are also ult. F. Mahomet, Mahoun, maumet, mummet, etc.] 1. a. Pertaining to Muhammad, or Mahomet (about A. D. 570 to 632), the founder of the Moslem religion, and after his flight from Mecca (622) the creator of the realm which grew into the Saracenic empire; pertaining to the religious and social system founded by Mohammed. — Mohammedan calendar, era, etc. See the notas.

II. n. A follower of Mohammed, the founder of the Moslem religion; one who professes Mohammedanism; a Moslem or Mussulman.

Mohammedanism (mō-ham'e-dan-izm), n. [< Mohammedan + -ism.] 1. The Mohammedan religion and polity; the religious and ethical system taught in the Koran; Islamism.—2. Belief in or adherence to the teachings of Mohammed.

Mohammedanize (mō-ham'e-dan-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedanized, ppr. Mohammedanizing. [< Mohammedan + -ize.] To make conformable to the principles or rites of Mohammed; make Mohammedan; convert to Islam. Also spelled Mohammadianize.

Mohammedism (mō-ham'e-dizm), n. [< Mohammed + -ism.] Same as Mohammedanism.

Mohammedise (mō-ham'e-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedized, ppr. Mohammedizing. Same as Mohammedanize.

moharra, mojarra (mō-har'ra), n. [< Pg.] 1. An emboloid fish, Hypsurus caryi, having a very short anal fin; so called from its resemblance to the Gerridae, which are known by the same name. [Local, Monterey, California.]—2. Any fish of the family Gerridae.

Moharram (mō-har'am), n. Same as Muharram.

Mohawk (mō'hák), n. [Formerly also Mohock, Mohack; Amer. Ind.] 1. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Huron-Iroquois family, situated along the Mohawk river. It was the easternmost of the Five Nations. See Iroquois.—2. A ruffian; specifically [cap. or l. c.], one of those who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the eighteenth century; so called from the Indian tribe of that name.

Give him [a youngster] Port and potent Hack;
From a Milkop he starts up Mohack.

Prior, Alma, III.

Did I tell you of a race of rakes, called the Mohocks, that play the devil about this town every night, sit people's noses and beat them, etc.?

Swift, Journal to Stella, March 8, 1711.

The Mohock-club, a name borrowed it seems from a sort of cannibals in India, who subsist by plundering and devouring all the nations about them.

Steele, Spectator, No. 324.

Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?

Gay, Trivia, III. 320.

Mohegan (mō-hé'gan), a. and n. Same as Mohican.

Mohican (mō-hé'kan), a. and n. [Also Mohegan; from the native name.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Mohicans or Mohegans.

2. n. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Algonkin stock.

Moho (mō'hō), n. [NL., < Hawaiian moho, the bird here defined.] 1. A genus of meliphagine birds peculiar to the Sandwich Islands, named by Lesson in 1831. The bill is arcuate, longer than the head, with naked operculum; the tarsus is boot-ed; and the plumage is blackish with yellow pectoral tufts and some white tail-feathers. There are 2 species, M. nobilis and M. apicalis, formerly called yellow-tufted booby. Also Mohoa (Reichenbach, 1850) and Acrocephalus (Cabanis, 1847).

2. [l. c.] Any bird of this genus.

Mohock, n. An obsolete form of Mohawk.

mohoe (mō-hō'), n. [Also moho, mohaut.] Same as mohoe, l.

mohr (mōr), n. [Ar.; cf. mohr, a colt.] An African antelope or gazel, Gazella mohr. The horns are annulated with ten or twelve complete rings. It is much sought after by the Arabs, on account of producing the hegen-stones so highly valued in Eastern medicine, commonly called in Morocco mohr's eggs. A related species Gazella summeringi, is known as Summering's mohr. Also mohar and muhar.

mohsite (mō'sit), n. [Named after Friedrich Mohs, a German mineralogist (1773-1839).] Native titanite iron, or ilmenite.

mohur (mō'her), n. [Also mohar; < Hind. muhar, muhr, mohr; Pers. muhur, muhr, mohr, a seal, a gold coin.] A modern gold coin of India under the British dominion, equivalent to 15 rupees, or about $7; also, a gold coin of the native princes of India from the sixteenth century onward.

Obverse. Reverse.
Mohur. (Size of the original.)

mohwa-tree, n. See mahwa-tree.

molder (mōi'dér), v. [Also moither; cf. mud-dle.] 1. trans. 1. To confuse; perplex; distract; bewilder.

I've been strangely molder'd ere sin 'bout this same news oth' French king I conno believe 'tis true.

Wit of a Woman (1706). (Nares.)

You'll happen be a bit molder'd with it (a child) while it's so little.

George Eliot, Alma Marner, xiv.

2. To spend in labor.

She lived only to scrape and hoard, moldering away her loveless life in the futile energies and sordid aims of a miser's wretched pleasure.

Cornhill Mag.

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. in both uses.]

II. intrans. To labor hard; toil. [Prov. Eng.]

moldore (mōi'dor), n. [Also mordore; < Pg. moeda d'ouro, lit. money or coin of gold; morda, < L. moneta, money; de, < L. de, of; ouro, < L. aurum, gold; see money, de, and aurum, or.]

Obverse. Reverse.
Moldore. (Size of the original.)

A gold coin (also called lombardine) formerly current in Portugal. It was equivalent in value to about $1.50.

He says his expenses in the relief of our prisoners have been upwards of fifty moldores.

Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 231.

molety (mōi'e-ti), n.; pl. moieties (-tiz). [Formerly also moith; < F. moitie = Sp. mitad = Pg. metade = It. metà, a half; < L. medietas (-is), a half, the middle, a middle course; < multus, middle; see medietas and medium.] 1. A half part or share; one of two equal parts; as, a moiety of an estate, of goods, or of profits.

The charge there would be so great by cruizers and expenses that the moiety of the profit would be wholly consumed.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 257.

2. A portion; a share.

Methinks my moiety, north from Burton here,

In quantity equals not one of yours.

Shak., I. Hen. IV., III. 1. 66.

Anti-moistety law, a United States statute of 1874, which repealed all United States moiety acts.—Moiety act, a statute giving one half of fines, penalties, and forfeitures to informers or private prosecutors.—Moiety system, a system at one time adopted by the United States government for finding out the names and indebtedness of delinquent taxpayers, by which the informer or person making the discovery and aiding in the collection received as compensation a certain proportion of the amount collected.

Peppys, Diary, Nov. 21, 1660.

Moire antique, silk watered in the antique style so as to resemble the materials worn in olden times.

moiré (mwō-rā'), n. [F.] Same as moire, 1.—Moire antique. See moire antique, under moire.—Moire métallique, tin-plate, or iron-plate which has been first coated with tin, so treated by acids as to give it a clouded, variegated, or variously crystallized surface. The effect is enhanced by heating the plate irregularly with a blowpipe immediately before applying the acids, or by first heating the plate, and then sprinkling it with water to cool it irregularly, and immediately applying the acids. The surface to be treated is first cleaned by washing with alkaline water, then dried, then dipped in dilute nitric or hydrochloric acid, then washed in pure water, and afterward in lime-water, to neutralize any remaining traces of acid, and dried. Lastly, the surface is usually covered with a tinted transparent lacquer. Plates of clean iron dipped in melted zinc, in the so-called galvanizing process, often acquire a beautiful crystalline surface, resembling in general effect the moire métallique.

moiré (mwō-rā'), v. t.; pret. and pp. moiré, ppr. moiré. [< moiré, n.] To give a variety of shades to, by the moiré métallique process of tin-coating.

Dict.—Moist color. See color.—Moist gangrene. See gangrene. 1.—Moist gum. Same as doctrine—Syn. 2.
Damp, Dank, Moist, Humid. Damp is generally applied where the slight wetness has come from without, and also where it is undesirable or unpleasant, as, a damp cellar, damp sheets, a damp evening. Dank strongly suggests a disagreeable, chilling, or unwholesome moist-ness. Moist may be a general word, but it is rarely used where the wetness is merely external or where it is unpleasant: as, a moist sponge, a moist hand, moist leather.
If we said the ground was moist, we should probably mean in a favorable condition for vegetation; if we said it was damp, we should probably mean that we ought to be careful about walking upon it. (C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 283.) Humid is a literary or scientific term for moist, but would be applicable only to that which is so penetrated with moisture that the moisture seems a part of it: as, humid ground, but not a humid sponge or hand.

Combuing out her long black hair
Damp from the river. Tennyson, Princess, iv.
My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank.

Purshas, Pilgrimage, p. 307.

2. Liquid. [Rare.]
If some penurious source by chance appeared Scanty of waters when you scould it dry,
And offer'd the full helmet up to 'tato,
Did he not dash th' untested moisture from him?
Addison, Cato, iii. 8.

Atmospheric moisture, the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere and the aqueous particles suspended in the form of fog and cloud, or precipitated as rain, hail, snow, etc.
The proportion of aqueous vapor in the air is variable;
it may amount to one twentieth part or more of the whole atmosphere. See Apparatus, Apparatus.

moisture (mois'tür), v. t. [cf. moisture, n.] To moisten; wet.

Who doubteth the abundance of the waters into rivers, or who maketh a waye for ye stormy weather, that it wa-tereth and moysureth the drye and barren ground?
Bible of 1551, Job xxxviii. 26.

mol, soft, cf. L. mollis, soft.] In geol., a name given in Switzerland to an important geological formation belonging in part to the Miocene and in part to a position intermediate between the Eocene and the Miocene. The formation is in places over 6,000 feet thick, and chiefly of lacustrine origin. The fossil vegetation of the Molasse is of great interest, being subtropical in character, containing palms of an American type, and also the coniferous genus Sequoia, now limited to California. It is the upper member of the Molasse which contains these plant-remains, and this part of the series is made up of red sandstones, marls, and conglomerate (sagittifera). The lower division of the Molasse is a sandstone containing marine and brackish water shells.

molasses (mō-lās'ez), n. [Formerly also, and prop., molassa; = F. melasse = It. melazzo (also,

Mold (Penicillium glaucum), magnified. a, the mycelium; c, the conidia.

9. Mucor. M. Mucedo forms small downy tufts of grayish-white color on bread, decaying fruit, etc. M. Synglium occurs on decaying mushrooms. Phycomyces pilosus, a related form, grows on oily or greasy substances. The common blue mold on decaying bread, cheese, etc., is Penicillium glaucum. See Mucor, Mucorin, Penicillium.

All moulds are inceptions of putrefaction, as the moulds of pie and flesh, which moulds afterwards turn into worms.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 330.

Black mold, a general name for certain hyphomycetous fungi having dark colored or carbonized mycelium, belonging chiefly to the family Dermateaceae.

10. mold³, mould³ (mold), n. [A later form, with excrement d, of mole¹. Prob. due in part to confusion with mold², mold². The form is extinct chiefly in iron-mold.] A spot; a stain, as that caused by rust.

Upon the little breast, like christall bright,
She mote perceive a little purple mold,
That like a rose her sicken leaves did faire unfold.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. xii. 7.

11. mold³, mould³ (mold), v. t. [< mold³, n.] To stain, as with rust.

12. mold⁴, mould⁴ (mold), n. [*< ME. mold, moulde, moulde, with unorig. medial d, for mole, < OF. mole, moule, mole, mosh, moulle, F. moule = Sp. Pg. molder, a mold, measure, < L. modulus, a measure, model: see modulus, model.] 1. A form or model pattern of a particular shape, used in determining the shape of something in a molten, plastic, or otherwise yielding state.

The mould of a man's fortune is in his own hands.

Bacon, Essays, Fortune.

New honours come upon him,
Like our strange garments, cleave not to their mould
But with the aid of use.

Shak., Macbeth, l. 3. 143.

Made in his image! Sweet and gracious souls,
Dear to my heart by nature's fondness names,
Is not your memory still the precious mould
That lends its form to him who hears my prayer?

O. W. Holmes, Love.

2. Form; shape; cast; character.

My some, if thou of such a mould
Art made, now tell me please thy shrift.

Greene, Conf. Amant., iv.

French churches, both under others abroad and at home in their own country, all cast according to that mould which Calvin had made.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., ll.

The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion, and the mould of form.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 1. 161.

Men of mould

Well embodied, well ensoiled.

Emerson, Monads.

3. Specifically, in founding, the form into which a fused metal is run to obtain a cast. Molds for metals and alloys having a low melting-point, as lead, type-metal, Britannia metal, etc., are made of iron or plaster of Paris, and may be used many times. Molds for the less fusible metals and alloys, as iron, brass, bell-metal, etc., are made in sand or loam and are divided into three classes: (a) Open molds, in which the pattern is impressed in the sand and withdrawn, and the molten metal is then poured in and finds its level. (b) Core molds, or molds in two parts called the drag and the cope (or core), forming together a two part flask, one part being placed over the other, and each being impressed with one half of the matrix or pattern. See flask, 2. (c) Loam molds, or molds built up with a core of brickwork or other material, and covered with foundry loam. As in the case of open molds, with close moulds a pattern, usually of wood, is used, being impressed one half at a time in the two parts of the flask or moulding-box, which, when put together so as to correspond, form the mold. Loam-molds are used especially in making large hollow castings, and do not require a pattern. These molds are of every shape and size, from molds for kettles and water pipes to those for engine cylinders and great cannons. Fine molds for making castings of insects, flowers, and other delicate objects are formed by suspending the object in a box by means of wires and covering it with plaster of Paris. When set the mold is heated until the object is burned, and the ash is then blown out, leaving the original shape in the mold. Another method is to fashion the figure in wax, boil it in plaster or clay, and then melt out the wax (cire perdue). In making plaster casts of parts of the human body, or of sculptors' models, the original mold requires to be cut to remove it from the object, and the parts are afterward fitted together. Gelatin, paper mache, and sulphur are also used for making certain kinds of molds. The type-mold of type-founders is of steel in two pieces, making right and left halves, on the top of which, when conjoined, the matrix is attached. Every body of type has its special mold, which can be used for that body only, but the mold is made adjustable for the varying widths of type.

Details of Type-mold.

a, the two halves of the mold united but without the matrix, showing the face of the type H as formed in the mold; c, one half of the mold; e, the other half of the mold, showing the body of the letter H in position; d, the matrix relatively enlarged, showing the face of the letter H.

4. In terra-cotta work, the plaster forms used in making terra-cotta architectural ornaments. They are usually in a number of parts, and when the clay is set sufficiently the mold is carefully taken apart. Similar molds are used also for glass, pottery, and waxwork.

5. In stucco-work, a templet or former for shaping cornices, centerpieces, etc.—6. In paper-manufacture, a frame with a bottom of wire netting which is filled with paper-pulp that in draining away leaves a film of pulp which is formed into a sheet of paper.—7. In ship-building, the pattern used in working out the frames of a vessel.—8. A former or matrix used in various household operations, as an incised stamp of wood for shaping and ornamenting pats of butter, or a form of metal, earthenware, etc., for giving shape to jellies, blanc-mange, loaves, etc.—9. In cookery, a dish shaped in a mold: as, a mold of jelly.

We had preserved plums to the mould of rice.

Dickens.

10. In anat., same as fontanelle, 2.—11. Among gold-beaters, a number of pieces of vellum or a like substance, laid over one another, between which the leaves of gold are laid for the final beating.—Elastic mold. See elastic. Gold-beaters' mold.

12. mold⁴, mould⁴ (mold), v. t. [< OF. moller, moler, F. mouler = Sp. Pg. molder, < L. modulari, measure; from the noun: see mold⁴, n.] 1. To form into a particular shape; shape; model; fashion; cast in or as in a mold; specifically, to form articles of clay upon a whirling table or potter's wheel, or in molds which open and close like those employed in metal-casting.

Though he have been or seemed somewhat harsh heretofore, yet now you shall find he is new moulded.

Sherley, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 220.

If these two things be supposed, that a man set before him honest and good ends and again, that he be resolute, constant, and true unto them, it will follow that he shall mould himself into all virtue at once.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 300.

Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man?

2. In ship-building, to give the required depth and outline to, as ships' timbers. Diamond-molded glass. See glass.—Molded breadth, the greatest breadth of a ship, measured to the outside of the frame-timbers.—Molded charcoal. See charcoal.—Molded glass, glass which is blown in a mold. The mold fits around the melted glass held on the end of the pontil, and is adapted for easy and rapid adjustment.—Molded wood, wood embraced in designs by having the pattern stamped deeply on the end grain of the wood, this end being then planed down to the bottom of the impression, and soaked in water, when the compressed parts swell up into high relief. Medallions and other decorative objects were produced in this way in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

3. mold⁴, n. An obsolete form of mole². Levin. moldability, mouldability (mold-la-bil-i-ti), n. [< moldable; see bility.] Capability of being molded.

4. moldable, mouldable (mold-la-bil), a. [< mold⁴ + -able.] Capable of being molded or formed.

The differences of impenetrable and not impenetrable; figurative and not figurative; mouldable and not mouldable.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 866.

5. moldalet, n. [ME., also molde-ale, a funeral feast, < molde, earth (with ref. to burial), + ale, a drinking, a feast: see mold¹ and ale. Cf. moldmrat. Hence pulled ale: see mull.] A funeral feast. Prompt. Parv., p. 341.

6. Moldavian (mol-da-vi-an), a. and n. [< Moldavia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or relating to Moldavia, a former principality of eastern Europe, now forming part of the kingdom of Rumania.—Moldavian balm, a blue-flowered labiate herb, Dracopis Moldavica, cultivated in flower-gardens, and of some culinary use.—Moldavian cloak, a long outer garment worn by women about 1860, having a cape in front covering the arms and serving on each side as a kind of sleeve.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Moldavia. mold-board (mold'board), n. 1. The curved board or metal-plate in a plow, which turns over the furrow.—2. In founding, the board on which the pattern for a mold is laid; a follow-board. mold-box (mold'box), n. A box used in casting steel under pressure for the manufacture of guns, etc. As devised by St. Joseph Whitworth, this is a cylindrical box in which melted crucible steel or Siemens-Martin process steel is subjected to a hydrostatic pressure of 6,000 pounds per square inch. Two closely fitting hoops of steel of ample strength are fitted on the interior with cast-iron lugs having vertical channels on the faces fitted to the hoops, and numerous channels leading from the vertical channels to the interior of the mold-box. The interior surfaces of the lugs are lined with refractory sand. A central core of cast-iron faced with refractory sand, and provided with horizontal and vertical channels like the lugs, is erected in the box, leaving annular space into which the metal is run. By means of a hydraulic press an annular piston or plunger is driven down upon the upper surface of the molten metal. The ness which would otherwise be retained in the metal are removed out, escaping through the channels in the legs and the core.

mold-candle (môld'kan'dl), n. A candle formed in a mold, as distinguished from a dipped candle or dip. See dip, n., 2.

mold-cistern (môld'sis'tern), n. In sugar-making: (a) The vat which receives the drippings from the sugar-leaves. (b) A tank in which the molds are washed after use. E. H. Knight.

molder¹, moulder¹ (môl'dér), v. [A freq. form of mold¹, mould¹.] I. intrans. 1. To turn to mold or dust by natural decay; waste away by a gradual separation of the component particles, especially without the presence of water; crumble.

The ninth (means to induce and accelerate putrefaction) is by the interchange of heat and cold, or wet and dry; as we see in the mouldering of earth in frosts and suns. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 337.

To Dust must all that Heav'n of Beauty (come)
And must Pastora moulder in the Tomb!
Congress, Death of Queen Mary.

The brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time, and the imagery moulders away.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. 5.

2. To be diminished; waste away gradually.

If he had sat still the enemy's army would have mouldered to nothing. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

II. trans. To turn to dust; crumble; waste.

These rocks (falling from mountain-tops) . . . when their foundations have been mouldered with age. Addison, Remarks on Italy.

molder¹, moulder¹ (môl'dér), n. [< molder¹, v.] Mold; clay.

Not that we are privy to the eternal counsel of God, but for that by sense of our airy bodies we have a more refined faculty of foreseeing than men possibly can have that are chained to such heavy earthly moulder.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 55. (Halliwel.)

molder², moulder² (môl'dér), n. [< ME. "molder, multure, mouldure, a former (knuder); < mold¹ + -er¹.] One who molds or forms into shape; specifically, one who is employed in making castings in a foundry.

Unthinking, overbearing people, who . . . set up for reformers and new moulders of the constitution.

By Berkeley, Discourse to Magistrates.

More distinct style than even blank-verse, and quite as plainly takes the stamp of its molder.

The Century, XXIX. 508.

Molders' clamp, flask, etc. See clamp, etc.

moldery (môl'dér-ē), n. [< molder¹ + -y¹.] Of the nature of or like mold. London.

mold-facing (môl'fā'sing), n. In iron- and brass-founding: (a) A thin coating of finely pulverized material dusted upon the inside faces of molds, to insure smooth outside surfaces on the castings. For iron, powdered charcoal and mill-dust, and sometimes plumbago, are used. For brass, pease-meal, powder of soapstone, rottenstone, graphite, and chalk are variously employed. (b) A wash of plumbago and water laid on the faces of a mold by gentle manipulation with a soft brush, and allowed to dry before the cast is made.

moldiness, mouldiness (môl'di-nēs), n. [< moldy¹ + -ness. Cf. moldiness.] The state of being moldy; moldy growth; minute fungi. See moldy².

His few Greek books a rotten chest contain'd, Whose covers much of mouldiness complain'd.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, III.

molding¹, moulding¹ (môl'ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold¹, mould¹, v.] The act of covering with mold; mold used to cover the roots of plants.

When the sprouts (of sugar-cane) are six or eight inches high, it will be necessary to put a gang in to give them a plentiful molding, in order to cover their roots and feed their stems.

T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1825), p. 326.

molding², moulding² (môl'ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold², mould², v.] 1. The process of shaping any plastic substance into a given form, as wax into artistic figures, or clay into bricks.

For there was never man without our molding,
Without our stamp upon him, and our justice,
Left any thing three ages after him
Good, and his own. Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, III. 2.

2. Anything cast in a mold, or anything formed as if by a mold.—3. In arch., a member of construction or decoration so treated as to introduce varieties of outline or contour in edges or surfaces, whether on projections or in cavities, such as on cornices, string-courses, bases, door- or window-jambes, lintels, etc. In classical architecture moldings are divided into three classes: the right-lined, as the fillet, beak, listel, regula; the curved, as the astragal or bead, the torus, the cavetto, the quarter-round, ovolo, and cushion; and the compound, as the ogee, talet, or cyma reversa, the cyma recta or dentata, and the scotia or trochilus, all of which are known by many synonymous names. In Roman architecture all curved moldings are formed of portions of circles, while in Greek architecture they are for the most part formed of some conic section, of which the curve, in good work, is always of extreme refinement. All these moldings are frequently enriched by carving. In the architecture of the middle ages there is very great diversity in the form and arrangement of the moldings. In the Norman style they consist almost entirely of rounds and hollows, variously combined with splays and fillets, a striking peculiarity of this style being the recurrence of moldings broken into zigzag lines. In the succeeding English style, the early Pointed, the moldings are much lighter and more boldly cut. In the Decorated style of the fourteenth century there is still greater diversity, and this period is further characterized by the introduction of the roll molding, and another termed the scot molding. In the Perpendicular style large and often shallow hollows prevail, and the moldings are in general of flatter profile and less effective than those of earlier periods. The moldings of medieval architecture are very commonly sculptured with surface-ornament beautiful in design and elaborate in workmanship. See cuts under dog-tooth moulding, egg, egg, indented, keel-molding, lunette, fret, &c. Self-molding, a molding passing entirely around the interior of a passenger-car, directly above the windows. Cor-builder's Deck.—Dovetail-molding. See dovetail. Embossed molding. See embossed.—Nail-headed molding. See nail-headed. Nebuly molding, in arch., a molding in Romanesque architecture the edge of which forms an undulating or wavy line; introduced in corbel tables and archivoltas. Baking molding, a molding incised from the horizontal or vertical, as that which often follows the line of a staircase, the roll of an ascending balustrade, etc.

Sections of Medieval Moldings.

4, Perpendicular style.

molding-bed (môl'ding-bed), n. A machine for working rectilinear moldings in marble. A traveling frame carries revolving grinders, and is adjustable vertically by a screw to the height required by the thickness of the marble. The grinders are solid cylinders of cast iron, and are counterparts of the required moldings.

molding-board (môl'ding-bôrd), n. Same as mold-board.

molding-box (môl'ding-boks), n. In foundry-work, a molding-flask.

molding-crane (môl'ding-kran), n. A crane adapted for use in a foundry in handling molds and flasks; a foundry-crane.

molding-cutter (môl'ding-kut'er), n. A tool working on the principle of the plane-iron or cutter of a hand-plane, the edge of which is formed by a bevel on one side of the tool. The edges of molding-cutters are formed to correspond with the outline of the cross-sections of the moldings to be cut, each cutter being adapted to only one pattern of molding. Thus, to cut a molding of semicircular cross-section, the edge of the cutter must be a semicircle of the exact size of the molding. Such moldings were formerly cut by hand-planing, but this is now almost entirely superseded by power planing machines with rotary cutters.

molding-file (môl'ding-fl), n. A file with a concave face used for finishing molded surfaces.

molding-flask (môl'ding-flask), n. 1. Same as flask, 2.—2. In dentistry, a jointed receptacle in three parts, in which the vulcanite model and plaster mold are secured in making dentures ready for the muffle. E. H. Knight.

molding-frame (môl'ding-frām), n. In foundrying, the templet by which an object is shaped in loam-molding. E. H. Knight.

molding-hole (môl'ding-hôl), n. In foundrying, an excavation in the foundry-floor in which castings of large size are made.

molding-loam (môl'ding-lōm), n. A mixture of clay and sand employed by foundrymen in constructing molds for loam-molding.

molding-machine (môl'ding-mā-shēn'), n. 1. In wood-working, one of a class of high-speed power-machines for planing, recessing, shaping, molding, profiling, and panelling wood. Such machines occupy in wood working much the same position as the milling-machine in metal-work, as both operate by means of revolving cutters. In molding-machines all the work is performed by revolving cutter-heads having variously shaped knives. These cutters are used singly, as in some panel-machines, and project through the table on which the work is laid, or they are arranged in gangs and series so that the wood in passing through the machine is exposed successively to all the cutters. By this gang-system of cutters it is possible to cut moldings and edgings of the most complicated pattern. One form of the machine has the cutters between the cutter-arbor bearings, and is known as a matching machine or wood-planing machine, or an inside-molding machine. In another form the cutters project up through the table and are arranged to work upon the inside edges of moldings. This type is known as the edge molding machine. Sometimes called carving-machine, curvity-planer, or relief-panelling machine.

2. A machine for making molding from an artificial composition. The material is forced from a hopper by a compressor, is carried by an apron beneath a die-wheel, and after being shaped by this it is delivered on a table.

3. In sheet-metal working, a rolling-machine with shaped rollers of which one is the counterpart of the other, for molding sheet-metal into shape for cornices, balustrades, etc.—4. In foundrying: (a) A machine for making loam-molds in flasks from small patterns carried by the machine. (b) A gear-molding machine.

Gear-molding machine, an apparatus for molding large gear wheels from a pattern of a small section of the gear, as of two teeth and the interstitial space.—Stone-molding machine, a machine for working stone moldings.

It resembles one form of stone-saw, but differs from it in having the frame which carries the revolving grinder adjustable, by means of a screw beneath, to the thickness of the slab. The grinder is kept constantly supplied with moist sand. Surface-molding machine, a form of molding machine with double-edged cutters and a rapid reverse motion. It is used to cut scrolls and plain or molded designs on the surface of solid wood, to rout such work as ends of pews and stairs, to form grooves for in-laid work, to make tinings for carving, etc.

molding-mill (môl'ding-mil), n. A sawmill or shaping-mill for timber.

molding-plane (môl'ding-plān), n. In joinery, a plane used in forming moldings; a match-plane. Such planes have various patterns or curves and concave soles for making the different parts of moldings, as hollows and rounds.

molding-plow (môl'ding-plōw), n. A plow with two mold-boards to throw the soil to both sides at once; a ridging-plow. It is used in forming ridges, in hilling potatoes, etc.

molding-sand (môl'ding-sānd), n. A mixture of sand and loam of which molds for use in a foundry are made.

molding-saw (môl'ding-sā), n. A circular saw or combination of circular saws for cutting out blocks approximating to the shapes of ornamental moldings. The molding is finished by cutters formed to the exact curve.

molding-table (môl'ding-tā-bl), n. A table on which a potter molds his ware. It has a trough in which the workman moistens his hands, and a block and stock board on which he places the tile-mold. There are also four pegs driven into the table at the corners of the block and stock board, to sustain the mold and regulate the thickness of the tile.

mold-loft (môl'd-lôft), n. A large room in a ship-building yard in which the several parts of a ship are drawn out in their proper dimensions from the construction drawings. Also called molding-loft.

[The various problems of laying off are solved upon the floor of a building known as the Mold-Loft, where the drawings furnished by the designer are transferred in chalk lines in full size, and then by the aid of geometry, and in the manner discussed in the following pages, the draughtsman determines and draws in the shapes of the various components of the frame. Molds are made to the lines, and with these molds and other data furnished by the draughtsman the workmen are enabled to trim the timbers or bend the angle-irons, and place such marks upon them as shall leave nothing but the putting together and fastening them in their places in order to construct the frame of the ship.

Thearle, Naval Architecture, § 1.

moldmeat, n. [Ofr. mouldmeat; < mold¹ + meat¹. Cf. moldale.] A funeral feast.

moldness, mouldness, n. [ME. mowledness; < mold², a. + -ness.] Moldiness. Cath. Ang., p. 244.

without complete separation of its parts.

We have, I believe, what we may almost call a new chemistry, some day to be revealed to us by means of photographic records of the behavior of molecules.

J. N. Lasker, Spect. Anal., p. 160.

Hence—2. A very small particle or bit of something; a particle; an atom. [Colloq.]—3. In ornith., the broad or cicatricula of a fecundated ovum. [Rare.]—Constituent molecule, a molecule which is united with others unlike itself, as some of the ingredients of a heterogeneous body.—Integral molecule. See integral.—Organic molecules, bodies capable of neither generation nor corruption, which were supposed by Buffon to account for the properties of living matter.—Syn. 1. Atom, etc. See particle.

mole-eyed (mō'īd), a. 1. Having very small eyes, like a mole's; having imperfect sight; purblind.

But this mole-eyed, dragon-tailed abomination (a crocodile) . . . was utterly loathsome.

G. W. Curtis, Nile Notes of a Howdy!, p. 75.

Hence—2. Figuratively, short-sighted; taking a narrow view of things: as, mole-eyed parsimony.

mole-heapt, n. Same as mole-hill. Minshew.

mole-hill (mō'hil), n. A little hill, hillock, mound, or ridge of earth thrown up by moles in burrowing underground. When moles are working near the surface in search of food, the hills become tortuous ridges which may be traced sometimes for many yards with little or no interruption.

A devil of pride

Ranges in airy thoughts to catch a star,
Whiles ye grasp mole-hills. Ford, Fancies, l. 3.

The glass through which an envious eye doth gaze
Can easily make a mole-hill mountain seem.

P. Fletcher, 'Upon his Brother's Book, Christ's Victory.

To make a mountain of (or out of) a mole-hill, to magnify an insignificant matter.

mole-hole (mō'hōl), n. The burrow of a mole.

molendinaceous (mō-len-di-nā'shi-us), a. [L. molendinus, a mill-house (< L. molendus, gerundive of molere, grind: see mill), + -aceous.] Like a windmill; resembling the sails of a windmill: applied to fruits or seeds which have many wings. [Rare.]

molendinarius (mō-len-di-nā-ri-us), a. [L. L. molendinarius: see molendinarius.] Same as molendinaceous.

molendinarius (mō-len-di-nā-ri), a. [L. L. molendinarius, < molendinum, a mill-house: see molendinaceous.] Relating to a mill; acting as a miller. [In the quotation the word is intentionally pedantic.]

Dismount, then, O lovely Molinara, unless thou wouldst rather that I should transport thee on horseback to the house of thy molendinarius father. Scott, Monastery, xlix.

mole-plant (mōl'plant), n. Same as mole-free.

mole-plow (mōl'plou), n. A plow having a pointed iron shoe secured to the end of a standard, used in making a deep drain for water.

mole-rat (mōl'rat), n. 1. A myomorph rodent quadruped of the family Spalacidae (which see for technical characters): so called from its resemblance to a mole in appearance and habits. The mole-rats are stout-bodied rodents, with short, strong limbs (of which the fore ones are fossorial), short or rudimentary tail, and minute or rudimentary eyes and ears. They live under ground and burrow very extensively. All belong to the Old World. The best-known species is Spalax typhlus of Europe and Asia. (Where are Indian and African, of the genera Heterocephalus and Rhizomys. The bathyergues are mole-rats of the subfamily Bathyerginae, inhabiting Africa, as the strand mole-rat, Bathyergus maritimus, and species of the genera Hellomys and Georchus.)

2. A fossorial murine rodent of the family Muridae and subfamily Siphacinae. It resembles the preceding superficially and in habits to some extent. These mole-rats are confined to the palaearctic region, where they are represented by the genera Siphus and Ellobius. The species, S. apicalis, is the best-known.

3. The Australian duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.

mole-shrew (mōl'shrō), n. 1. An American short-tailed shrew, of the family Soricidae and genus Blarina, somewhat resembling a small mole. B. brevicauda is the largest and best-known species, common in the United States and Canada. See out under March.

2. Any American mole; a shrew-mole. All the American Talpidae (genera Scalops, Scapanus, and Condylura) differ from the Old World moles, and somewhat approach shrews in character. The name is also applied to Neurotrichus glabris, which is of a different family (Soricidae).

mole-skin (mōl'skin), n. and a. 1. The skin of a mole.—2. A kind of fustian, double-twisted and extra strong, and cropped before dyeing. Compare beaver-teen, 2.

II. a. Made of or resembling mole-skin: as, a mole-skin vest; a mole-skin purse.

mole-spade (mōl'spād), n. A spade or apud used in prodding for moles, or in setting traps for them.

Poor Menaphon neither asked his swayer for his sheep, nor took his mole-spade on his neck to see his pasture. Greene, Menaphon, p. 83.

molest (mō-lest'), v. t. [ME. molesten, < OF. molester, F. molester = Sp. Pg. molestar = It. molestare, < L. molestare, trouble, annoy, molest, < molestus, troublesome, < molea, a burden, difficulty, labor, trouble: see mole.] To trouble; disturb; harass; vex; meddle with injuriously.

But how this can doth Trolius molest,
That may none earthly mannae longe seyn.

Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 880.

My Father was afterwards most unjustly and spitefully molested by y^e Jeering Judge Richardson, for reproving the execution of a woman. Knox, Diary, Nov. 3, 1683.

The moping owl does to the Moon complain
Of such as, wand'ring near her secret bower, Molest her ancient solitary reign. Gray, Elegy.

—Syn. Annoy, Plague, etc. (see tear). Incommode, discommode, inconvenience.

molest (mō-lest'), n. [molet, v. Cf. molest.] Trouble.

Thus clogg'd with love, with passions, and with grief,
I saw the country life had least molest.

Greene, Song of a Country Swain, in The Mourning (Garment).

molestation (mōl-es- or mō-les-tā'shion), n. [ME. molestation, < *ML. molestatio = L. molestari, trouble: see molest, v.] 1. The act of molesting.—2. The state of being molested; annoyance; vexatious interference.

The knight and his companion, having reached the castle, . . . passed the bridge, and entered the gate without molestation.

Huide, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xiv, note 8.

3. In Scots law, the troubling or harassing of one in the possession of his lands. An action of molestation arises chiefly in questions of common or of controverted marches or land-boundaries. —Syn. 1. See tear.

molester (mō-les'tēr), n. One who molests, disturbs, or annoys.

Surely to every good and peaceable man it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands. Milton, Church Government, ii, Pref.

molestful (mō-les'tfūl), a. [molet + -ful.] Troublesome; annoying; harassing.

But that [pride] which breaketh out to the disturbance and vexation of others is hated as molestful and mischievous. Burton, Works, l. xlii.

molestlet, n. [ME. moletu = Sp. Pg. It. molestia, < L. molestia, troublesome-ness, trouble, < molestus, troublesome: see molest, n.] Trouble; distress.

In this manner he ne getweth hym nat suffourance that power forleteth and that molestu (var. molestie) pricketh. Chaucer, Boethius, iii, prose 9.

molestions (mō-les'chion), a. [moletu + -ous.] Troublesome; annoying.

molest, n. A Middle English form of mullet.

mole-track (mōl'trak), n. The track or course of a mole under ground.

mole-tree (mōl'trō), n. A biennial plant, caperspurge (Euphorbia Lathyris, considered officious in clearing land of moles. Its seeds have been used as a cathartic. Also mole-plant.

molette (mōl'et'), n. [OF. molette.] In her., same as mullet.

molewarp, n. See molehearp.

mole-y, a. See moly.

moleynet, n. A Middle English form of mullet.

moli (mō'li), n. [Native name.] A small tree, Bracconia heliandra, growing in elevated regions in the Somali country, Africa. It yields a sort of dragon's blood, said not to be exported, yet resembling it not identical with that known as drag dragon's blood, attributed to Bracconia tinctoria of the island of Zanzibar.

A resin of sedulous flavor obtained from the moli tree (Bracconia heliandra). Bot. Amer., N. S., LV, 844.

Molidæ (mōl'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. Mola + -idæ.] A family of gymnodont plectognath fishes, of the superfamily Molidæ; the sunfishes, head-fishes, mole-buts, or molidæ. They have a compressed-oblong body, longer than high, and a posterior marginal or caudal fin between the dorsal and anal, supported by corresponding interapical bones (in the adult at least 4 or 5 above and 5 or 6 below) and connected with the posterior surfaces of the neural and hemal spines of the last complete (typically 16th) vertebra. The family contains several fishes of remarkable appearance, whose body ends behind so abruptly that it seems as if cut off. The best-known, Mola mola, attains great size, sometimes weighing 700 or 800 pounds; it is best known by the name of sunfish. Other species, belonging to two different genera, are smaller. The family is also named Orthopristidae, and is synonymous with the subfamily Cephalinae. See cut under Mola, 1.

Molière (mō-lī-er'), a. [Molière (see def.) + -ique.] Pertaining to or resembling Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin, called Molière, 1622-73), the greatest comic writer of France, or his plays.

Crispin and Turecaret are unquestionably Molièresque, though they are perhaps more original in their following of Molière than any other plays that can be named.

Kings, Brd., XIV, 372.

molimen (mōl'i-men), n. [L. molimen, great effort, < molere, toil, < molea, a burden, difficulty: see mole.] Great effort or endeavor; especially, in physiol., extraordinary effort made in the performance of any function: as, the menstrual molimen.

moliminous (mō-lim'i-nus), a. [L. molimen (-im), great effort, + -ous.] 1. Made with great effort or endeavor.—2. Of grave import; momentous.

Prophesies of an vast and moliminous concurrence to the world. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 321.

moliminously (mō-lim'i-nus-ly), adv. In a moliminous or laborious and unyielding manner. See the quotation under cumbersome. [Rare.]

Molina (mō-lī-nā), n. pl. [NL. Mola + -ina.] Günther's third group of Gymnodontes: same as the family Molidæ.

moline (mō'lin), n. and a. [L. L. molinus, pertaining to a mill, molina, a mill, < L. mola, mill-stone, mill: see mill.] 1. n. The crossed iron sunk in the center of the upper millstone, for receiving the spindle fixed in the lower stone; a mill-rynd.

II. a. In her., resembling a moline.—Cross moline. See cross.

Molinia (mō-lī-nī-ā), n. [NL. (Schrank, 1780), named after J. Molina, a writer upon Chilean plants and animals.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Festuceae and the subtribe Eragrostinae, characterized by an elongated narrow panicle, small spikelets with from two to four flowers, and awnless glumes, the empty ones being slightly smaller than the flowering ones. There is but a single species, M. coriacea, found throughout Europe and variously named blue or purple molinia grass, purple molinia grass, and Indian grass. It is a rather coarse stiff perennial, often three feet high, having narrow flat leaves, which are chiefly radical and form large tufts. It is common in woods, on moors, and in wet heathy places, but is of little agricultural value.

Molinism (mō-lī-niz-m), n. [cf. Molina (see def.) + -ism.] The doctrine, propounded in 1588 by Luis Molina, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, that the efficacy of divine grace depends simply on the will which accepts it—that grace is a free gift to all, but that the consent of the will is requisite in order that grace may be efficacious.

Molinist (mō-lī-nist), n. [cf. Molina (see Molinism) + -ist.] One who holds the opinions of Molina in respect to grace, free will, and predestination. See Molinism.

Molinist (mō-lī-nist), n. [cf. Molinism (see def.) + -ist.] A quietist, or follower of Miguel de Molinos (1627-98), who taught the direct relationship between the soul and God.

molture (mōl'ti-tūr), n. [ML. moltura, a grinding, < L. molere, grind: see mill.] (Cf. mul-ture.) A feed in kind for the use of a mill; mulcture. Darwin.

This (the Bishop of Rome's) claim of universal power and authority doth bring upon molture to their mill. Atq. Bramhall, Works, II, 150.

Moll (mol), n. [Also Moll, Mol (also dim. Mollie); a reduced form of Mary. It occurs with dim. -kin in walkin, mawkin.] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary.—2. [L. e.] A female companion not bound by ties of marriage, but often a life-mate; a word in common use among navvies, coastermongers, and the like. [Eng.] Moll Thompson's brand, M. T. & Co. empty; applied to an empty jug, decanter, bottle, or other vessel for liquor. [Colloq. and humor.] moll (mol), a. [L. mollis, soft, mollis, soft.] In music, minor: as, C moll, or C minor.

molla, mollah (mol'la), n. [Also moolah, mool-lah, mulla, mullak; < Turk. Pers. molla, mulla = Hind. mauli, maulat, < Ar. maulā, a dignity, judge, etc., master, lit. patron.] 1. A Moham-

Mole-rat: Spalax typhlus

and ears. They live under ground and burrow very extensively. All belong to the Old World. The best-known species is Spalax typhlus of Europe and Asia. (Where are Indian and African, of the genera Heterocephalus and Rhizomys. The bathyergues are mole-rats of the subfamily Bathyerginae, inhabiting Africa, as the strand mole-rat, Bathyergus maritimus, and species of the genera Hellomys and Georchus.)

2. A fossorial murine rodent of the family Muridae and subfamily Siphacinae. It resembles the preceding superficially and in habits to some extent. These mole-rats are confined to the palaearctic region, where they are represented by the genera Siphus and Ellobius. The species, S. apicalis, is the best-known.

3. The Australian duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.

mole-shrew (mōl'shrō), n. 1. An American short-tailed shrew, of the family Soricidae and genus Blarina, somewhat resembling a small mole. B. brevicauda is the largest and best-known species.

medan title of honor or compliment given to various religious dignitaries, as heads of orders, and others exercising functions relating to the sacred law, as well as to students of that law. It is not conferred by formal authority, but is an expression of public respect, like master.—
2. A superior judge of the Moslem sacred law.

The nomination [of the mufti of Constantinople] must fall on one of the mollas, who form the upper stratum of the hierarchy of ulemas.
Encyc. Brit., XLII. 661.

mollé, n. A Middle English form of mull.

mollémoke, n. Same as mollémoque.

Mollés (mol'ez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. mollis, soft. Cf. mollusk.] In Lamarck's classification (1801-12), an order of Vermes, containing the tapeworms and flukes.

molléton (mol'e-ton), n. [F., < mollé, dim. of mou, mol, soft, < L. mollis, soft.] Swanskin; a kind of woolen blanketing used by printers as an elastic impression-surface. Sammonds.

molléwell, n. [ME., origin obscure. Cf. milwell.] The sea-culf. Nomuncle MS. (Halliwell.)

moll-horn (mol'hérn), n. The common European heron, Ardea cinerea. [Local, Eng.]

Mollia (mol'i-á), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. mollis, soft; see mollé, Mollen.] In Lamarck's classification (1801-12), an order of his class Radiaria, containing the aculeophs.

mollity (mol-i-ti), n. [Irreg. < L. mollities, softness (see mollis), < -ity.] Softness; mollification.

mollie (mol'i), n. [Abbr. of mollémaroking. Cf. molly.] A meeting of ship-captains held on board one of several whaling-ships when ice-bound in company. See the quotation. [Naut. slang.]

Whenever the whaling fleet is stopped for a number of days in the ice, it is the practice for the captains to assemble on board one or the other of the ships to discuss the prospects of the season's catch. These interviews are called Mollies, and are announced by a bucket hoisted as a signal at the fore-royal masthead. . . . Generally speaking, a Mollie means making a night of it.
Schley and Soley, Lessons of Irony, p. 183.

mollit (mol'i-put), n. [= Sp. mollit, < L. mollit (t-s), pp. of mollire, soften, < mollis, soft; see mollé.] Softening; emollient; soothing. Bailey, 1727.

mollitly (mol'i-put-li), adv. With softening or soothing effect.

mollifiable (mol'i-fi-a-bl), a. [= Sp. mollificable = Pg. mollificavel; as mollify + -able.] Capable of being mollified, softened, or soothed. Ash.

mollification (mol'i-fi-ká-shon), n. [F. mollification = Pr. mollificacio = Sp. mollificación = Pg. mollificação = It. mollificazione, < ML. mollificatio (n-), < L. mollificare, soften; see mollify.] 1. The act of mollifying or softening.

For mollification, or mollification, it is to be enquired what will make metals harder and harder, and what will make them softer and softer.
Baron, Physiological Romances.

2. Pacification; an appeasing; something that will soothe.

Some mollification for your giant, sweet lady.

Shak., T. N., I. & 218.

mollifier (mol'i-fi-ér), n. One who or that which mollifies. Baron.

mollify (mol'i-fi), v. t. prot. and pp. mollified, pp. mollifying. [F. mollifier = Pr. mollificer = Sp. mollificar = Pg. mollificar = It. mollificare, < LL. mollificare, soften, < mollificus, making soft, < L. mollis, soft, + facere, make; see -fy.] 1. trans. 1. To soften; make soft or tender.

When they have killed a great beast, they cut out all the veins and sinews . . . and likewise all the Suet; which done, they die them in water to mollify them.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 213.

They have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment.
Isa. I. 6.

2. To soothe; mitigate; appease; pacify; calm or quiet.

All things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his rage, he [a king religious and envious in God's cause] procureth.
Raleigh, Hist. World, V. II. 3.

Chiton mollify'd his cruel mind
With art, and taught his warlike hands to wind
The silver strings of his melodious lyre.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, I.

3. To make less harsh; qualify; tone down; moderate; abate.

Mince the sin and mollify damnation with a phrase.
Frederick

They would . . . sooner prevail with the houses to mollify their demands.
Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

4. To induce or incline by making tender.

If it wrought no further good in him, it was that he, in despite of himself, withdrew himself from harkening to that which might mollify his hardened heart.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetria.

I shall deliver words with mollify
The hearts of beasts to spare thy innocence.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 2.

= Syn. 2 and 3. To mitigate, ease, moderate. — 2. To soothe, quiet.

II. intrans. To become soft or tender. [Rare.]

Philanax, feeling his heart more and more mollifying unto her, renewed the image of his dead master in his fancy.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

molligut (mol'i-gut), n. The angler or goosefish, Lophius piscatorius. [Connecticut, U. S.]

molline (mol'in), n. [NL. mollis, soft, + -ine.] A base for ointments used in the treatment of skin-diseases.

It is essentially a soft soap mixed with excess of fat and glycerin. It is made of caustic potash lye having a specific gravity 1.145, glycerin, and coconut-oil, in the proportions 100 parts of oil, 40 parts of lye, and 30 parts of glycerin. The saponification of the oil is carefully performed without heat. The glycerin is afterward thoroughly incorporated by carefully heating and mixing, and the result is a yellowish white substance of soft consistency containing 17 per cent of uncombined oil, which is easily removed from the skin by either warm or cold water.

It is necessary to say that no lard is ever used, a substitute being found in a saponaceous preparation which is known under the name of molline.
Lancet, No. 3423, p. 608.

Mollinedia (mol-i-né-di-á), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after F. Mollinedo, a Spanish chemist and naturalist.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants of the natural order Monimiacae and the tribe Monimieae, characterized by sessile or stalked drupes on a disk-shaped receptacle, from which the perianth falls off like a lid, by subsessile anthers with the cells united into one at the apex, and by an indefinite number of stamens. They are trees or shrubs, with opposite leaves and insignificant green flowers, which are usually duple and grow in axillary or subterminal clusters. There are 30 species, natives of Australia and the warmer parts of America. Several species are highly aromatic, like the nutmeg. See inkberry, 3.

molliplose (mol-i-p'los), a. [F. mollis, soft, + -pilos, a hair; see pilose.] Having soft or fine pelage or plumage, as a quadruped or bird; being fleecy, fluffy, or downy, as hair or feathers.

molliplosity (mol-i-p'los-i-ti), n. [F. molliplosité, < -ity.] Fleeciness or fluffiness of the pelage or plumage of quadrupeds or birds.

mollities (mol-i-sh'i-az), n. [L. softness, < mollis, soft.] 1. in mol., softness; softening. — Mollities cerebri, softening of the brain. — Mollities ossium, softening of the bones; osteomalacia.

mollitious (mol-i-sh'us), a. [L. mollities, softness; see mollities.] Luxurious.

Here, mollitious alcoves gill

Superb as Byzant domes that devils built!

Browning, Sordello, III.

mollitude (mol'i-tud), n. [F. mollitude, softness, < mollis, soft.] Softness; effeminacy. Campbell.

Molluginæ (mol-u-jin'gē), n. pl. [NL. (Fenzl, 1840), < Mollugo (Mollugin) + -æ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Ficoides, characterized by a deeply five-parted calyx, and by having from three to five petals, or sometimes none, and hypogynous or partly perigynous stamens. It includes 14 genera, Mollugo being the type, and about 73 species, the majority of which grow in Africa; but a few genera, as Mollugo and Gibbula, are very widely distributed.

Mollugo (mol-lu'gō), n. [Linnaeus, 1737]. < L. mollugo, a plant also called lappago. < mollis, soft.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ficoides and the tribe Molluginæ, characterized by a capsular fruit, a three- to five-celled ovary containing many ovules, and stipulate leaves which often appear to be whorled. They are erect or diffuse herbs, usually having forked branches, linear-obovate or spatulate leaves, and inconspicuous greenish flowers in axillary umbel-like cymes. About 15 species have been enumerated, which are common in the warmer parts of the globe. M. verticillata is common throughout the United States. See carpet-weed, and Tadpole chickweed (under chickweed).

mollusc, n. See mollusk.

Mollusca (mol-lus'ká), n. pl. [NL., pl. of mollusca, a soft-bodied animal, a mollusk; see mollusk.] One of the leading divisions of invertebrated animals; an extensive series of invertebrates whose bodies are soft, without any jointed legs, and commonly covered with a hard shell in one, two, or more pieces, and whose principal parts are neither segmented into a series of longitudinal rings, as in insects, crustaceans, and worms, nor radially arranged, as in echinoderms; the mollusks, as the univalve or bivalve shell-fish of ordinary language. Mollusks have no trace of a notochord or urochord, which distinguishes them from certain organisms, as ascidians, formerly classed with them. They are primitively bilaterally symmetrical, or have a right and left "side" along a main axis; this form is best expressed in the chitons, and is evident in bivalves, slugs, etc., but its expression is often obscured by a twisting to which the body is subjected in various univalves, as those whose shells are spiral. (See Nautilus, Ammonites.) There is always a well-defined alimentary canal, with definite walls. A nervous system is well developed as a set of ganglia with connecting commissures, one characteristic feature of which is the formation of a nervous ring or collar around the gullet, and another is the torsion of the visceral commissures in those forms whose bodies are twisted as above said. (See Euthyneura, Strophonura.) Most mollusks have a distinct head, which, however, is not apparent in bivalves, lending to a division of headless mollusks (Acephala or Lepidocera). A characteristic organ of Gastropoda or mollusks with heads is the odontophore, buccal mass, or muscular tongue, whose radula serves as a rasping organ in a mouth otherwise soft and toothless. Various modifications of the radular teeth give rise to several descriptive terms. (See Strophodontate, Strophodontate, Strophodontate, Strophodontate.) There is always a heart, with a ventricle and at least two auricle, and dorsal in position. Its relative situation with respect to the gills differs in certain groups of mollusks. (See opisthobranchiate, probranchiate.) The circulation is double. The respiratory system is branchial, and in some cases, as of snails and slugs, modified for breathing air into a kind of lung. (See Pulmonata, Gastropoda.) The primitive typical gills are paired organs called ctenidia; but these undergo many modifications, and their function of respiration may be assumed vicariously by other parts of the body not homologous with them. These modifications give rise to the names of many subordinate groups of mollusks, especially of Gastropoda, besides that of the great series Lamellibranchiata. The renal organs of mollusks are technically called nephridia, or organs of Bojanus. (See cut under Lamellibranchiata.) The sexual organs are developed, either in the same individuals, or in different individuals of opposite sexes. The characteristic organ of locomotion is the foot or podium, a development of the under surface of the body, which may be a broad flat sole (see cut under Gastropoda), upon which the mollusk creeps, or otherwise shaped. It is often wanting, as in the oyster, or may give rise to a thready byssus by which the animal is rooted, as in the mussel. Forms of the podium give names to most of the leading groups of mollusks, as Cephalopoda, Pteropoda, Scaphopoda, Heteropoda, Gastropoda, and Lamellibranchiata. A large part of the soft integument of mollusks forms what is called the mantle or velum, from which the shell, when present, is developed (see integumentum, integumentum), and the impression of the edge of the mantle on the inside of the shell is the pedicel line. Some mollusks are entirely naked, or have only a rudimentary and concealed shell, as land-slugs and sea-slugs, and also most of the living Cephalopoda. The body of Cephalopoda is strengthened by an internal skeleton, the cuticular or cuttlebone, though no mollusk has an articulated internal skeleton. But the great majority of mollusks have a hard shell (whence the old name Testacea, testaceolermata), of a horny or chitinous or more decidedly calcareous substance. Those whose shell is single are called univalves; those in which it forms a hinged pair of shells are bivalves; but the former may have an additional shelly piece, closing the aperture, the operculum; and the two main valves of the latter may be supplemented by accessory valves (see cut under accessory). Bivalves are the natural group of headless or lamellibranch mollusks; but univalves include several orders, though the word is chiefly used of the numerous and conspicuous Gastropoda. A few mollusks are technically multivalve; such are the chitons, hence called Polydora, having several segments of the shell in lengthwise series. (See cut under chiton.) Trilobites used to be considered multivalve mollusks. The shell is usually covered outside with a rough skin or epidermis; inside it may be beautifully lustrous, as with mother-of-pearl. Most mollusks live either in salt, brackish, or fresh water; land-mollusks are mostly found in damp places. Most are locomotory, either by creeping or by swimming; some swim by flapping their shells, others by moving various appendages; many adhere to or even burrow deeply in rocks; a few are parasitic. Some are carnivorous, others herbivorous; most are oviparous, a few ovoviviparous. Many are important as food, and the shells of many are put to useful or ornamental purposes. Certain bivalves furnish pearls. The Mollusca have been variously rated, limited, and classified; at one time the bodies of the animals were differently named from their shells. (See Linnaeus.) (1) The name was originally proposed by Jonston in 1650 for naked cephalopods and for Aplysia, and adopted by Linnaeus in 1758 as his second order of Vermes, including similar naked forms and some heterogeneous elements. Linnaeus made the Testacea or shelled mollusks his third order of Vermes; and these two groups were combined as a class by Felt in 1791. (2) About 1800 Cuvier made Mollusca the second of his four branches of the animal kingdom, with seven classes, Cephalopoda, Gastropoda, Pteropoda, Acephala, Brachiopoda, Nuda, and Cirrhopoda (the Nuda being ascidians, and the Cirrhopoda being crustaceans). (3) In Lamarck's system, 1819, Mollusca, as a class, were exclusive of the bivalves (called by him Conchifera), and were divided into five orders, Pteropoda, Gastropoda, Trachelopoda, Cephalopoda, and Heteropoda. (4) In 1825 Brachman extended Mollusca to all invertebrates except the articulates. (5) The cirrhipods having been recognized as crustaceans by Thompson in 1829, and the same naturalist having at the same time investigated the polyzoans, the relation of the latter to the brachiopods led J. M. Edwards in 1846 to associate the two Cuvierian groups Brachiopoda and Nuda with the Polysa in a division called Mollusca (the vertebrate animals, Polysa, Nuda or ascidians not being recognized till much later, in 1860). (6) These dissociations from Mollusca in a former ants have left the group now generally recognized and as above defined. It is regarded as a phylum whose main divisions are classes. These main groups are, in one series of handbooks mollusks, Asapha or Liposapha, the single class variously called Cuvierifera, Lamellibranchiata, Platybrachia, Pelecypoda, Cervicopoda, and by other names of bivalves; and, in another series, Cephalopoda, Odonatopoda, or Gastropoda, the four classes Gastropoda, Scaphopoda, Pteropoda, and Cephalopoda. But from among the gastropods are to be taken the chitons (together with Monacina and Chitonodermis), unless Gastropoda is used in a very broad sense; and some authors also dissociate the heteropoda as a class. See further under the above technical names.

molluscan (mo-lus'kan), a. and n. [L. molluscus, soft (N.L. molluscum, a mollusk), + -an.] I. a. Soft-bodied; pertaining to the Mollusca in any sense, or having their characters; molluscoid; malacozoic: as, a molluscan type.

II. n. A mollusk; a shell-fish; any member of the Mollusca, Molluscoidea, or Malacozoa.

molluscoid (mo-lus'koid), a. and n. [N.L. molluscum, mollusk, + Gr. eidos, form.] I. a. 1. Like a mollusk; molluscan or molluscous. — 2. Specifically, as much like a mollusk as a brachiopod or a moss-animal is; pertaining to the Molluscoidea, or having their characters.

II. n. An animal of the group Molluscoidea in any sense.

Molluscoidea (mol-us-koi'dē), n. pl. [N.L.: see molluscoid.] Same as Molluscoidea.

molluscoid (mol-us-koi'dal), a. [Gr. molluscoid + -al.] Same as molluscoid.

molluscoidan (mol-us-koi'dan), a. and n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoidea (mol-us-koi'dē), n. pl. [N.L.: Mollusca + -oidea.] A subkingdom or branch of the animal kingdom related to the Mollusca proper, constituted by Henri Milne-Edwards in 1844 for certain animals which had before been included in Mollusca. (a) At first embracing the classes of brachiopoda, polyzoma or bryozoans, and tunicates or ascidians. (b) Restricted to the tunicates and polyzoma. (c) Restricted to the brachiopoda and polyzoma. (d) Further restricted to the brachiopoda alone.

molluscoidan (mol-us-koi'dē-an), a. and n. I. a. Same as molluscoid.

II. n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoidea (mol-us-koi'dē), n. pl. [N.L.: Mollusca + -oidea.] The original form of the word Molluscoidea or Molluscoidea. H. Milne-Edwards, 1844.

molluscous (mo-lus'kus), a. [Gr. mollusk + -ous.] Same as molluscan: as, molluscous softness or flabbiness.

* A molluscous man, too suddenly ejected from his long-accustomed groove, where, like a toad imbedded in the rock, he had made his niche exactly fitting to his own shape, presents a wretched picture of helplessness and shiftiness. Sally (by Her.) molluscum (mo-lus'kum), n. [N.L., neut. of L. molluscus, soft: see mollusk.] In pathol., a term applied to certain soft cutaneous tumors of slow growth without constitutional symptoms. — Molluscum adenosum. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum albinosum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum bodies, peculiar round or oval bodies, sharply defined and of a fatty appearance, seen under the microscope among the contents of the tubercles of molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum epitheliale, an epidemic growth in the form of papules and tubercles from the size of a pinhead to that of a pea, or rarely larger, pearly and waxy in appearance, and containing molluscum bodies. It has been said on questionable evidence to be contagious. — Molluscum fibrosum, an affection of the skin consisting of scellie, painless, soft or sometimes firm fibromata, from the size of a pea to that of an egg or larger. — Molluscum non-contagiosum or pendulum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum sebaceum or scellie. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum simplex. Same as molluscum fibrosum.

mollusk, mollusc (mol-us'k), n. [Gr. mollusque = Sp. molusco = Fr. mollusco, N.L. molluscum, a mollusk, a mollusk (cf. L. molluscus, a fungus which grows on the maple-tree; mollusca, a nut with a thin shell), neut. of L. molluscus, soft, (mollis, soft: see *moll*²).] A soft-bodied animal, usually with an external shell; a member of the Mollusca in any sense. See Mollusca. — Articulated mollusk, a former name of De Blainville's Molluscorum, comprising the cirripeds and the chitons, unnaturally associated. See Nematopoda, Polypodopoda. — Hemal mollusk, those mollusks (and supposed molluscoidea) whose intestine has a hemal fissure, as the heteropoda, many gastropoda, etc. — Neural mollusk, those mollusks and molluscoidea whose intestine has a neural fissure. They are the cephalopoda, pteropoda, palmonata, and lamellibranchia, together with brachiopoda and polyzoma.

molluskigerous (mol-us-kij'e-rus), a. [Prop. molluscigerous; N.L. molluscum, a mollusk, + L. gerens, carry: see ger, gerous.] Having or bearing mollusks: specifically applied by Huxley to the elongated tubular sacs occasionally found attached by one end to an intestinal vessel of an echinoderm, Synapta digitata, and containing the ova or embryos of the molluscan parasite Entozoeca mirabilis.

moll-washer (mol'wash'er), n. The washer or wastail, a bird. Also called molly wash-dish, etc. [Local, Eng.] moll-wire (mol'wir), n. A pickpocket who robs women only. (Thieves' slang.)

Molly (mol'i), n. [Dim. of Moll, or var. of the orig. Mary: see *Moll*¹.] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary. — 2. [i. e.: pl. mollies (-iz).] The wastail, a bird: as, the yellow molly (the yellow wastail); the molly wash-dish (the pied wastail). [Local, Eng.] molly (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Abbr. of mollymark, malleusmark.] The malleusmark or fulmar, Fulmarus glacialis. See *fulmar*².

molly (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Hind. moli.] In India, a gardener or one of the caste of gardeners. Also mallee.

Our garden is nearly washed away, and our molly, or gardener, does not present us with our morning bouquet. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II, 121.

mollycoddle (mol'i-kod-l), n. [Also mollycoddle: *Molly*¹, *Moll*¹, + *coddle*².] One who lacks resolution, energy, or hardihood; an effeminate man: used in derision or contempt.

He [Fielding] couldn't do otherwise than laugh at the puny cockney bookseller, pouring out endless volumes of sentimental twaddle, and hold him up to scorn as a mollycoddle and a milkop.

Thackeray, English Humorists, Hogarth, Smollett, and Fielding.

molly cottontail. See cottontail.

Molly Maguire (mol'i-mag-wir'), [A name assumed (from Molly, a familiar form of the feminine name Mary, and Maguire, a common Irish surname) by the members of the organization (def. 1), in allusion to the woman's dress they wore as a disguise. There is no evidence that the name referred orig. to a particular person named Molly Maguire.] 1. A member of a lawless secret association in Ireland, organized with the object of defeating and terrorizing agents and process-servers, and others engaged in the business of evicting tenants.

These Molly Maguires were generally stout active young men, dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened or otherwise disguised. . . . In this state they used suddenly to surprise the unfortunate grippers, keepers, or process servers, and either duck them in bogholes or beat them in the most unmerciful manner, so that the Molly Maguires became the terror of all our officials. W. S. Trevelyan, Recollections of Irish Life, vi.

Hence — 2. A member of a secret organization in the mining regions of Pennsylvania, notorious for the commission of various crimes, including murderous attacks upon the owners, officers, or agents of mines, until their suppression by the execution of several of their leaders, about 1877.

mollymawk (mol'i-mák), n. A variant of mollmawk.

molly-puff (mol'i-puf), n. A gambling decoy. Thou molly puff: were it not justice to kick thy guts out? Shakespeare, The Taming of the Shrew, IV, 8.

Moloch (mō'lok), n. [Also sometimes Malch: L. Moloch, Gr. Moloch, Malch, Heb. malkh (usually with the article) (also Milkom, Malkam, Gr. Malchom, E. Malcom); cf. molech (= Ar. melch, king, cf. malkh, reign, part. molekh, reigning).] 1. The chief god of the Phœnicians, frequently mentioned in Scripture as the god of the Ammonites, whose worship consisted chiefly of human sacrifices, ordained by fire, mutilation, etc.: also identified with the god of the Carthaginians called by classical writers Kronos or Saturn. Hence the word has now become a designation of any baneful influence to which everything is sacrificed. And they built the high places of Baal . . . to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Moloch; which I commanded them not. Jer. xxxiii. 25.

First Moloch, horrid king, besought with blood of human sacrifice, and parents' tears. Milton, P. L., I, 302.

It was a very Moloch of a baby, on whose inanimate altar the whole existence of this particular young brother was offered up a daily sacrifice. Dehman, The Haunted Man, II.

2. [N.L.] The typical genus of Molochina. There is but one species, M. horridus of Australia, one of the most repulsive, though in reality one of the most harmless, of reptiles, the horns on the head and the numerous spines on the body giving it a formidable aspect.

3. [i. e.] A lizard of this genus: as, the spiny molly.

Molochina (mol-ō-ki'nē), n. pl. [N.L.: Moloch + -ina.] A subfamily of agamid lizards having a depressed body, a very small mouth, and the upper teeth directed horizontally inward. The body is beset with large spines, especially on the head, giving an ugly and formidable appearance to an entirely harmless creature.

molochine (mol'ō-kin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Molochina.

II. n. A moloch.

Molochize (mō'lok-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Molochized, ppr. Molochizing. [Gr. Moloch + -ize.] To sacrifice or immolate as to Moloch. [Rare.]

I think that they would Molochize them [their babies] too. To have the heavens clear. Trumbull, Harold, I, 1.

moloid (mol'oid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Molidae.

II. n. A member of the family Molidae.

Moloides (mō'loi'dē), n. pl. [N.L.: Mola + -oides.] In Gill's ichthyological system, a superfamily of gymnodont plectognath fishes, founded upon the single family Molidae. The moloids are without pelvic or ribs. They have the body truncated behind, the caudal region abraded, and the jaws without median sutures. See Molidae.

Molokan (mol-ō-kin'), n.; pl. Molokans (-s). [Russ. molokan, Gr. molake, milk: see milk.] A member of a Russian sect living chiefly in southeastern Russia. They condemn image-worship, fasting, and episcopacy, and accept the Bible as the only rule of faith and conduct. They hold their religious services in private houses, and have a simple church organization. Their name is derived from their reputed practice of drinking milk on fast-days—a departure from the custom of the Orthodox Church. Also written Molokan.

The Molokans are Russian sectarians: closely resembling Scotch Presbyterians. J. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 187.

molompi (mō-lom'pi), n. [Native name.] The African rosewood. See rosewood.

molopes (mō-lō'pēs), n. pl. [N.L.: Gr. molopē (molopē), the mark of a stripe, a weal.] In pathol., same as ribbles.

molosse (mō-lō'sē), n. [Gr. molossus = Sp. moloso, L. molossus, a foot so called: see molossus.] Same as molossus.

Molossus, n. Plural of molossus, 1.

Molossian (mō-lō'si-an), a. and n. [L. Molossia, Gr. Molossia, the country of the Molossians, cf. Molossia, Molossian, pl. Molossians, L. Molossii, the Molossians.] I. a. Relating or belonging to the Molossians, or Molossi, a tribe of ancient Epirus, in northern Greece.

II. n. 1. One of the Molossian tribe. — 2.

molossic (mō-lō'sik), a. [Gr. Molossus + -ic.] In pros., being or pertaining to a molossus.

Molossidae (mō-lō'si-dē), n. pl. [N.L.: Gr. Molossus + -idae.] The Molossidae regarded as a family composed of the genera Molossus, Nyctinomus, and Chiropterus; the bulldog bats, or mastiff bats.

Molossine (mō-lō'si-nē), n. pl. [N.L.: Gr. Molossus + -inae.] A subfamily of bats of the family Emballonuridae; the molossoid or bulldog bats: so called from the physiognomy, a peculiar expression being conferred by the thick pendulous chops, like a bulldog's. They have large feet, with the first toe, or first and also the fifth, much larger than the rest, the foot free from the wing membranes, which fold under the forearm, a retractile intermembral membrane stretching and sliding along the tail, and a single pair of large upper incisors. In all the genera, excepting Myotis, the long tail is produced far beyond the intermembral membrane. Leading genera are Molossus, Chiropterus, and Myotis.

molossine (mō-lō'si-nē), a. and n. [Gr. Molossus + -inae.] I. a. Pertaining to the Molossinae, or having their characters; molossoid.

II. n. A bulldog bat; a molossoid.

molossoid (mō-lō'si-oid), a. and n. [Gr. Molossus + -oid.] I. a. Molossine, in a wide sense; pertaining to or resembling the Molossinae.

II. n. A member of the Molossinae; a molossoid bat.

Molossus (mō-lō'sus), n. [In def. 1, L. molossus, a metrical foot, cf. Gr. molossus, a metrical foot of three long syllables, cf. Molossus, Molossian. In def. 2, N.L.: L. Molossus, a Molossian hound, cf. Gr. Molossus, Molossian: see Molossian.] 1. [i. e.: pl. molosses (-i).] In classical pros., a foot of three long syllables. — 2. In mammul., the typical and leading genus of Molossinae. There are numerous species inhabiting tropical and subtropical America, as M. obscurus, M. obscurus, etc. These bulldog bats have the tail long and curved, thick pendulous lips, prominent nostrils, large rounded ears, the incisors one above and one or two below on each side, and the premolars two below and one or two above on each side.

3. In conch., a genus of mollusks. Montfort, 1808.

Molothrus (mol'ō-thrus), n. [N.L. (Swainson, 1831), said by the name to come from Gr. molothrus, qui non vocatus alienas oves intrat, an unbidden guest, appar. an error for Molobrus (as given by J. Cabanis), cf. Gr. molothrus, a greedy fellow.] A genus of American ovine passerine birds of the family Ictridae and subfamily Agelaiinae, parasitic in habit; the cow-birds, cowpen-birds, or cow-buntings. There are several species of North and South America, all of which lay their eggs in other birds' nests, as far as is known. Like the Old World cuckoo, M. ater or peculiaris abounds in most parts of the United States. M. oregonus, a large handsome species, inhabiting Texas and Mexico, is the bronzed or red-eyed cow-bird. The genus is also called Hypobletia. See cut under cow-bird.

molrooken (mol'ruk-en), n. [Origin obscure.] The great crested grebe, Podiceps cristatus. C. Swainson. [Lough Neagh, Ireland.]

molsh, n. See mulsh.

molt, v. An obsolete preterit of melt. Chaucer.

molt¹, moult¹ (molt), v. [With unorig. l, < ME. moulen, moulen = D. moulen = MLG. lāt, māten = OHG. māzen, MHG. māzen, change, l. mausen, change the feathers or skin, molt, < L. mutare, change: see mut² and mut³, doublets of molt².] I. trans. To shed or cast, as feathers, hair, or skin; slough off: often used figuratively.

No shall my anticipation prevent your discovery, and your secrecy to the king and queen must no feather.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 306.

Mute the skylark and forlorn.

When she moult the fluttering plumes. Coleridge.

We all moult our natures in the natural course of life. Southey, The Doctor, lxxx. (Darwin.)

II. intrans. 1. To cast or shed feathers, hair, skin, or the like; undergo or accomplish a molt; exuviate; mew. See the noun.

Long as the bird may live, and often as it may moult, the original style of markings never gives way to any other.

A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., IX. 2.

2. To be about to be cast off or shed, as plumage.

Our hero gave him such a sudden flit in the mouth as dashed in two of his teeth that then happened to be moulting. Brooke, Food of Quality, I. 104. (Darwin.)

molt², moult² (molt), n. [< molt¹, moult¹, v.] 1. The act or process of shedding or casting any tegumentary, cuticular, or exoskeletal structures or appendages, as feathers, hair, skin, nails, horns, hoofs, claws, or shell; ecdysis; exuviation. The surface of the body of most animals, outside of the parts which are vascular or supplied with blood, is worn away by friction, attrition, or other mechanical means. This process may be slight and gradual or continuous, as in the case of man, where it results in scarf-skin and dandruff; or it may be periodical and very extensive, affecting the whole cuticle or its appendages. Mammals shed their hair usually once a year. Birds molt their feathers usually at least once, often twice, sometimes three a year, the last two cases constituting the double and the triple molt. Both these classes of animals, in some cases, molt cuticular substances in man. Thus, the American antelope sheds the sheath of the horn; lemmings and ptarmigans drop their claws; some birds of the auk family shed the horny parts of the beak; snakes cast their outside whole, even to the layer over the eyeball; crustaceans slough the whole shell; and numerous other invertebrates have a proper molt of similar or analogous character.

2. The period or time of molting.

moltable (mol'ta-bl), a. [Irreg. for mettable.] That can be molted; fusible.

moltet. An obsolete past participle of melt¹. Chaucer.

moltan¹ (mol'tn), p. a. [Ep. of melt¹.] 1. Melted; in a state of fusion or solution: as, moltan gold.

Love's mystick form the artisans of Greece
In wounded stone or molten gold express. Prior.

Solid iron floats upon molten iron exactly as ice floats upon water. Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 124.

A prince whose manhood was all gone,
And molten down in mere uxoriousness. Tennyson, Geraint.

2. Made or produced by means of melting.

And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf. Ex. xxxi. 4.

3. Liquid.

Sua hanc kepe

Three night in molten dung.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

moltan², moltant (mol'tn), p. a. [Irreg. for molted, pp. of molt², v.] Having molted; being in the state of molting.

A clip-wing'd Griffin, and a molting Raven.

Shak., I Hen. IV. (Vol. 1633), III. 1. 162.

moltanly (mol'tn-li), adv. Like what is in a molted state; liquidly.

A living language . . . moltanly ductile to new shapes of sharp and clear relief in the moulds of new thought. Lowell, Among my books, 1st ser., p. 165.

molting, moulting (mol'ting), n. [With unorig. l, as in molt², moult², v., < ME. mouling, mouling; verbal n. of molt², moult², v.] 1. The act or process of molting; molt.

O hath my leaden soul the art t' improve

Her wasted talent, and, unaided, aspire

In this and molting time of her desire?

Quincy, Fables, x. 4.

2. The molting season.

Also in the season was past

For horth y-headed so hy, and so noble

To make any myrthe for mortynge that nyghed.

Richard the Redde, II. 12.

molto (molt'ō), adv. [It., very much, < L. multus, much: see multitude.] In music, very; much: as, allegro molto, very fast.

Molucca balm. See Moluccella.

Molucca bean, deer, etc. See bean, etc.

Moluccella (mol-uk-sel'ij), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named from the Molucca Islands, of which the plant was supposed to be a native.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ and the subtribe Lamneæ. It is characterized by the posterior lip of the corolla being usually concave and covered with long soft hairs, by the calyx being larger at the apex, with an oblique limb having from five to thirteen unequal spiny teeth, and by having the anther-cells extremely divergent. They are very smooth annual herbs, with petiolate leaves and axillary whorls of small flowers. There are but 2 species, both native in the eastern Mediterranean region. M. loricata, an old garden-flower from Asia, once supposed to come from the Moluccas, is called Molucca balm, and also shell-flower, from its large cup-shaped calyx, which has the small corolla at the bottom.

Molva (mol'vā), n. [NL. (Nilsson, 1832), a name of this fish.] A genus of gadoid fishes, related to the burbot and cusk, having the mouth terminal, anal fin entire, and canine teeth on the vomer and mandible. M. molva or vulgaris is the common ling of North Atlantic waters. See cut under ling.

molwarb, n. See moldwarp.

moly¹ (mō'li), n. [Also moley; < mole² + -y¹.] Like a mole or its habits. [Rare.]

He . . . did . . . infinite service in discouraging . . . the moly, creeping style, which at that time infected all the ranks both of the laity and clergy.

Goldsmith, Eucorinaga and Discouragers of English Literature, II.

moly² (mō'li), n. [< L. moly, < Gr. μολύ, a fabulous herb.] 1. A fabulous herb of magic power, represented as having a black root and the flower milk-white, said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus (Ulysses) to counteract the spells of Circe.

And yet more medicinal is it than that moly

That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave.

Milton, Comus, l. 636.

But as ye hearth moly hath a flower as white as snow, and a root as black as ink, so age hath a white head, showing peltie, but a black heart, swelling with mischief. Joly, Epiphany and his England (Arber's Reprints, IV. 251).

Homer is of opinion that the principal and sovereign herb of all others is moly; so called (as he thinketh) by the Gods themselves. Holland, tr. of Iliad, xxv. 4.

2. Wild garlic, Allium Moly. The moly of Dioscorides is said to have been Allium subhirsutum; the dwarf moly is A. Chamomoly.

molybdate (mo-lib'dāt), n. [< molybdic + -ate.] A compound of molybdic acid with a base. — Molybdate of lead, yellow lead ore; the mineral wulfenite. See wulfenite.

molybdena (mol-i-bdē'nā), n. [= F. molybdène = Sp. It. molybdena = Pg. molybdene, molybdena, < L. molybdenum, < Gr. μολύβδαινα, galena or litharge, < μολύβδος, lead, = L. plumbum, lead: see plumb.] Same as molybdenum.

molybdeniferous (mol-i-bdē-nif'ē-rus), a. [< L. molybdēna (see molybdena) + ferre = F. fer.] Containing molybdenum.

molybdenite (mol-i-bdē'nit), n. [< molybdēna + -ite.] Sulphid of molybdenum, occurring in foliated masses or in scales, less often in hexagonal crystals, of a lead-gray color and metallic luster. It is very soft, and, like graphite, which it closely resembles, leaves a trace on paper.

molybdenous (mol-i-bdē'nus), a. [< molybdēnum + -ous.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum.

molybdenum (mol-i-bdē'nūm), n. [< NL. molybdenum, a later form for L. molybdēna; see molybdēna.] Chemical symbol, Mo; atomic weight, 96. A metal of a silver-white color, but harder than silver, which fuses with difficulty, if at all, at the highest temperature of a wind-furnace. Its specific gravity is 8.6. It is chemically related to chromium, tungsten, and uranium, and, like those metals, forms trioxides which are acid-forming and yield very characteristic salts. It is remarkable for the number of oxides and corresponding chlorides which it forms; but it is the least important economically of the group to which it belongs. The most abundant ore of molybdenum is the sulphurated (molybdenite), and the strong external resemblance of this mineral to graphite (lead plumbago) led to the confusion of molybdenum with that substance; moreover, external resemblance and certain chemical peculiarities caused still further difficulties of nomenclature, in which manganese, antimony, and even magnesia were involved. Thus, the peroxide of manganous was called by Linnæus molybdæum manganæ. These perplexities were not cleared up until toward the end of the last century; but finally, as the result of the labors of Scheele, Berzelius, and Weyl (1778-80), the metal molybdæna, or molybdænum, as it is now more generally called, was isolated from its combinations. The ore of molybdenum are somewhat widely diffused, but rarely occur in any considerable quantity. The principal molybdeniferous minerals are molybdenite and wulfenite. There is also a molybdic ether (the trioxide) and a carbonyl (paternite); various ores of iron also contain traces of this metal.

molybdic (mō-lib'dik), a. [= F. molybdique; as molybd(enum) + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum. — Molybdic acid, HMoO₄, an acid of molybdenum, which may be obtained in yellow crystalline crusts. Its salts are called molybdates. — Molybdic ether, native molybdic oxid.

molybdin (mō-lib'din), n. [< molybd(enum) + -in.] Molybdic ether.

molybdite (mō-lib'dit), n. [< molybd(enum) + -ite.] Molybdic ether.

molybdocolic (mō-lib-dō-kol'ik), n. [< Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + κολικός, colic: see colic.] Lead-colic.

molybdomenite (mō-lib-dō-mō'nit), n. [< Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + μύνη, moon, + -ite (cf. selenite).] A rare lead selenite, occurring in thin transparent scales of a white or greenish color, found with other selenium minerals at Cacho in the Argentine Republic.

molybdoparens (mō-lib-dō-par'ē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + παρεῖς, palsy.] Lead-palsy.

molybdosis (mol-i-bdō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μολύβδος, lead.] Lead-poisoning.

molyne (mo-li-nā'), a. [See moline.] In her., same as moline when applied to a cross.

molyte (mol'i-tē), n. [Said to be < Gr. μολύβδος, var. of μολύβδος, a staining, defilement, < μολύνειν, stain, also half-cook, + -ite.] A chlorid of iron occurring as a thin yellow or red incrustation on lava at Vesuvius.

momt, a., n., and v. See mum.¹

momblement, n. See mumblement.

momblishness (mom'blish-nēs), n. Muttering talk. Bailey, 1731.

mome¹ (mōm), n. [< OF. mome, a mask; see mum².] A buffoon; a fool; a blockhead; a ninny; a dull person; a stupid fellow.

I dare be bold awhile to play the mome,

Out of my sacke some other faults to lease.

Mir. for Mays, 404. (Nares.)

Mome, malt-horse, capon, cockcomb, likot, patch!

Shak., C. of K., III. 1. 82.

Words are but wind, but blowes come home,

A stout tongu'd lawyer's but a mome.

Brown's Songs (1661), p. 100. (Halliwel.)

Parasitus is not clone

By every such mome

Drayton, Skeltoniad, p. 1873. (Nares.)

Away with this foolish mome!

Flodden Field (Child's Ballads, VII. 78).

mome² (mōm), a. [< F. mome.] Soft; smooth. Halliwel. [North. Eng.]

mome³, n. [ME. mome = MD. moeme, D. moe = ML. mōme = OHG. muomā, MHG. muome, G. muhme, aunt, cousin; cf. Icel. mōma, mother; prob. orig. 'mother's sister,' and related to AS. mōdor, E. mother: see mother.¹] An aunt. Nominal MS. (Halliwel.)

momelet, r. An obsolete form of mumble.

moment (mō'ment), n. [< F. moment = Sp. lg. It. momento, a moment, < L. momentum, a balance, balancing, alteration, a particle sufficient to turn the scales, hence a particle, point, point of time, short time, moment, a cause, circumstance, matter, weight, influence; contr. of momentum, < moerere, move: see more, s. Cf. movement.] 1. A space of time incalculably or indefinitely small. (a) Time too brief for reckoning; an instant: as, I have but a moment to spare; wait a moment.

We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.

Do not delay: the golden moments fly!

Longfellow, Masque of Pandora, vii.

(b) Precise point of time: exact or very instant, as of a motion, action, or occurrence: as, at that moment he expired.

A prince, the moment he is crown'd,

Inherits every virtue sound.

Swift, On Poetry, I. 92.

Every moment dies a man,

Every moment one is born.

Tranquillo, Vision of Stm, iv.

(c) A brief interval: the passing time: in the phrase for a moment: as, for a moment he was at a loss.

The tip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment.

Prov. xii. 19.

The "Daily News" expresses the general sense . . . in recognizing defeat as decisive for the present.

New York Tribune, July 15, 1860.

2. The present time; especially, with the definite article, the precise instant of opportunity.

The moment should be improved; if suffered to pass away, it may never return.

Washington, in Harvard's Hist. Comm., I. 28.

x. Momentum; impetus; moving cause; impelling force or occasion.

Each on himself relied,
As only in his arm the moment lay
Of victory.
Millon, P. L., vi. 280.

4. Notable purport; weight or value; importance; consequence: as, his opinions are of little moment to us.

Being for many respects of greater moment, to have them [princes] good and virtuous than any inferior sort of men.
Puffendorf, Arts of Eng. Poetic, p. 23.

Capital criminals, or matters of moment, before the Chan himself, or Privy Counsellors, of whom they are always heard, and speedily discharged.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 30.

5. A forcible or convincing plea.

He . . . pressed the former arguments, refuted the evils, . . . and added . . . many moments and weights to his discourse.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 77.

6. An essential or constituent element; an important factor.

It is a complete mistake historically to assume that the moment of Cartesianism is consciousness.
Fetich, Intro. to Descartes's Method, p. lxxix.

7. In math., an increment or decrement; an infinitesimal change in a varying quantity. — 8. In mech., in general, effect; avail. The phrase in which it appears have exact meanings, though the precise sense in which the word itself is taken in these phrases is not always clear. — Bending-moment. Same as moment of force. — Equation of moments. See equation. Logical moments. See logical. — Moment-axis of a couple, the line which represents in direction the direction of a couple, and by its length the moment. — Moment of a couple, the product of the force by the length of the arm. — Moment of a force. (a) With regard to a point, the product of a force by its distance from the point. (b) With reference to a line or axis, the product of the component of the force in the plane perpendicular to the line by the distance of that component from that line. — Moment of a magnet, or magnetic moment, the product of the numerical strength of either pole of the magnet by the distance between the poles.

The total moment of a magnet is the moment when it is at right angles to the lines of force.
J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 161.

Moment of deviation or distortion. Same as product of inertia (which see, under inertia). — Moment of flexure. See flexure. — Moment of inertia. See inertia. — Moment of rupture, the moment of flexure of a beam calculated for a predetermined or assumed breaking load and leverage. Its formula is $M = \frac{w b^2}{2}$, in which $b =$ breadth, $h =$ depth, w a factor varying with shape of cross-section, and l a factor depending on the nature of the material. Both factors w and l are determined and tabulated for different materials from experimental data. — Moment of stability of a body or structure supported at a given plane joint, the moment of the couple of forces which must be applied in a given vertical plane to that body or structure in addition to its own weight, in order to transfer the center of resistance of the joint to the limiting position consistent with stability. — Rankine. — Virtual moment of a force, the product of the force by the virtual velocity of the point of application. — Syn. 1. Minute, Instant, twinkling, second, trice, flash. A moment has duration, an instant has not: as, wait a moment; come this instant. Practically, however, the two are often the same. A minute is just sixty seconds, a moment is a short but less definite period.

Moments make the year. Young, Love of Fame, vi. 265.

There are minutes that fix the fate
Of battles and of nations.
H. H. Brownell, The Bay-Fight.

The duke does greet you, general,
And he requires your haste post-haste appearance,
Even on the instant.
Shak., (Othello, I. 2. 38.)

Moment (mó'men-t), v. t. [< moment, n.] To order or arrange to a moment.

All accidents are minute and momentated by Divine Providence. Fuller, Worthies, Suffolk, II. 234. (Darwin.)

Moments, n. Plural of momentum.

Momental (mó'men-tal or mó-men'tal), a. [*< OF. momental, < LL. momentalis (in adv. momentaliter), of a moment, < momentum, moment: see moment.] 1. Pertaining to a moment. — 2. Lasting but a moment; very brief.

Not was momental minute doth she swerve.
Bacon, Sir P. Sidney's Urania (1606).

3. Momentous. — 4. Of or pertaining to momentum. — Momentous ellipsoid. See ellipsoid.

momentally (mó'men-tal-i), adv. 1. For a moment.

As but momentarily remaining in our bodies hath no proportionable space for its conversion, only of length enough to refrigerate the heart. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

2. From moment to moment.

Momentally the corporeal spirits are dissolved and consumed, as also, in like manner, the humors, and solid parts. Bonaventura, Passengers' Dialogues (1612). (Sars.)

Momentaneous, a. [< OF. momentaine, < LL. momentaneus, of a moment: see momentaneous.] Momentaneous; momentary.

You will remember how transitory this present life is, and how short and momentaneous the pleasure of this fifth day is.
Shak., Chronicle, The Marston, an. 746.

Momentaneous (mo-men-ta-ne-us), a. [< F. momentané, OF. momentaine (see momentane)] = Sp. momentáneo = Pg. It. momentaneo, < LL. momentaneus, < L. momentum, a moment; see moment.] 1. Lasting for a moment; momentary. — 2. Pertaining to instants of time; instantaneous.

momentaneous (mó'men-tá-ne-us), n. [< momentaneous + -ness.] Momentaneous. Sp. Hall, Character of Man.

momentary (mó'men-tá-ri), a. [< LL. momentaneus; see momentaneous.] Lasting for a moment; momentary.

Making it momentary as a sound,
Swift as a shadow, short as any dream.
Shak., M. N. D., I. 1. 143.

Other momentary delights only supply the forehead, not unburthen and solace the heart.
Ford, Line of Life.

momentarily (mó'men-tá-ri-li), adv. 1. So as to be momentary; for a moment.

I repeatedly watched the flowers, and only once saw a humble-bee momentarily alight on one, and then fly away.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 84.

2. From moment to moment: as, he is momentarily expected.

Why endow the vegetable bird with wings, which nature has made momentarily dependent upon the soil?
Shedd, (Latham.)

momentariness (mó'men-tá-ri-ness), n. The state of being momentary.

momentary (mó'men-tá-ri), a. [< LL. momentarius, of a moment, brief, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] 1. Lasting but a moment or for a very short time; of short duration: as, a momentary pang.

Joys' lightnings, the precursors
Of the dreadful thunder claps, more momentary
And slight-outrunning were not.
Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 202.

With wings more momentary swift than thought.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 2. 14.

Upon serious consideration of the frailty and uncertainty of this momentary life, . . . I . . . do make and declare . . . my last will and testament.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 430.

His griefs are momentary and his joys immortal.
Steele, Spectator, No. 75.

2. Short-lived; likely to die soon or at any moment. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Men are the subjects of fortune, and therefore momentary.
Greene, Penelope's Web (1687).

Only give it [this paper] leave to tell you that that lord whom perchance the king may be pleased to hear in it is an old and momentary man.
Donne, Letters, cxlix.

That hour perhaps
Is not so far when momentary man
Shall seem no more a something to himself.
Tennyson, Lucretius.

3. Occurring every moment: as, momentary interruptions.

The due clock swinging slow with sweepy away,
Measuring time's flight with momentary sound.
Warton, Inscriptions.

momently (mó'men-tli), adv. From moment to moment; every moment.

Of tuneful Caves and playful Waterfalls —
Of Mountains varying momently their crags Proud be this Land!
Wordsworth, Glen of Loch Elgie.

Momently the mortar's iron throat
Boared from the trenches.
Whittier, Dream of Pio Nono.

momentous (mó'men-tus), a. [< LL. momentosus, of a moment, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] Of moment or consequence; of surpassing importance; critical.

We ought constantly to bear in our mind this momentous truth, that in the hands of the deity time is nothing, that he has eternity to act in.
Paley, Sermons, xlii.

The emigration of the fathers of these twelve commonwealths . . . was the most momentous event of the seventeenth century.
Hancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 469.

—Syn. Grave, serious.

momentously (mó'men-tus-li), adv. To a momentous degree; with important effect or influence: as, this engagement bore momentously on the course of the war.

momentousness (mo-men'tus-ness), n. The state or quality of being momentous or of grave importance.

These and many other difficulties beset Dr. M . . . in the course of his study; nor is he unaware of their variety or momentousness.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 225.

momentum (mó'men-tum), n.; pl. momenta (-tá). [< L. momentum, balance, alteration, cause, etc., orig. 'a movement': see moment.] 1. In mech., the product of the mass and velocity of a body; the quantity of motion of a body.

In all relations between bodies, such as impacts, the algebraic sum of the moments is preserved constant. See energy.

When the velocity is the same, . . . the momentum, or moving force, of bodies is directly proportional to their mass or quantity of matter. . . . When the momenta of two bodies are equal, their velocities will be in the inverse proportion of their quantities of matter.
Lardner, Handbook of Nat. Philos., § 106, 109.

The rate of mass displacement is momentum, just as the rate of displacement is velocity.
Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. lxvii.

2. An impulse; an impelling force; impetus.

This preponderating weight . . . complicated that momentum of ignorance, rashness, presumption, and lust of plunder which nothing has been able to resist.
Burke, Rev. in France.

He never asks whether the political momentum set up by his measure, in some cases decreasing but in other cases greatly increasing, will or will not have the same general direction with other like momenta.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 30.

3. Constituent or essential element. Compare moment, 6.

I shall state the several moments of the distinction in separate propositions.
Sir W. Hamilton.

4. In musical notation, an eighth-rest.

momie, n. A variant of mummy.

momie-cloth, n. See mummy-cloth.

Momier (mom-i-ér), n. [< F. lit. a mummy: see mummy.] A term of reproach applied to those Swiss Calvinists who, about 1818, separated from the state church and maintained a strict Calvinistic theology and Methodist discipline.

momish (mó'mish), a. [< momie + -ish]. Foolish; dull. Lerna.

Thy pleasant framed stile Discovered eyes to momish mouths.
Vernon prefaced to Googe's Epitaph. (Denton.)

momism (mó'mizm), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ism]. Carping; faultfinding. Minshew.

momist (mó'mist), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ist]. A faultfinder.

As for the crabbed & critical interpretation of many, . . . I wald hit little, and leave the detracting speeches of barking Momists.
Times Whistle (E. E. T. A.), p. 111.

mommy, n. An obsolete form of mummy.

momnick, n. [< Var. of mammoth, n.] A scarecrow. [Prov. Eng.] momnick (mom'ik), v. t. [< Var. of mammoth, v.] To cut awkwardly; mow or make a mess of as, he mommicks his food. [Obsolete or prov.]

mommy (mom'i), n.; pl. mommies (-iz). [A var. of mummy; cf. old-wife, old-squaw, old-granny, etc.] A duck, Harleia glacialis, the old-wife or south southerly. [Cape May, New Jersey.]

Momordica (mó-mór-di-ká), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called in allusion to the seeds, which have the appearance of being bitten; < L. mordere (perf. momordis), bite: see mordant.] A genus of plants of the natural order Cucurbitaceae and the tribe Cucurbitineae, characterized by the stamens being inserted below the mouth of the calyx, by the calyx being provided with two or three scales, and by having a campanulate corolla and simple tendrils. They are climbing herbs, either annual or perennial, having entire lobed or compound leaves and rather small white or yellowish flowers, which are monocious or dioecious. The fruit is oblong or cylindrical, berry-like or opening into three valves, having few or many seeds. Twenty-five species are known, natives chiefly of Africa, but also of tropical Asia and Australia. They are plain plants except for their fruit, which in some species is red or orange-yellow, and which bursts when fully ripe, disclosing the red-seeded seeds. Such are the species M. balsamifera, the balsam-apple and M. charantia, sometimes called balsam-peewee, the best known cultivated species. The squirting cucumber, which grows in the south of Europe, was formerly placed in this genus, under the name M. elaterium, but is now regarded as the type of a distinct genus, Ecballium.

momot (mó'mot), n. Same as motmot.

Momota (mó-mó-tá), n. [NL.] Same as Momotus. Shaw, 1800.

Momotidae (mó-mot-i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -idae]. An American family of serratorostrat plearian birds, typified by the genus Momotus; the motmots or sawbills. They are related to the kingfishers. The tail is long and graduated, of 10 or 12 rectrices, of which the middle pair are usually long exserted and spatulated, forming a pair of rackets; the plumage is alternated the bill serrated, and the sternum doubly foveolated: there are no spurs nor apical upsternum, and there are two carotids. The Momotidae are confined to the warmer parts of America. There are only about 15 species, of the genera Momotus, Oryzopsis, Paraphtheropus, Eumomota, Prionerhynchus, and Elymomanes. The family is also called Prionitidae. See motmot.

Momotine (mó-mó-ti-né), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -inae]. 1. The only subfamily of Mo motidae. Also called Prionitinae. — 2. The Momotidae as a subfamily of some other family.

Momotus (mó-mó-tus), n. [NL.; see motmot, motmot.] The typical genus of Momotidae, established by Brisson in 1760. It was formerly coextensive with the family, but is now restricted to such species as M. brasiliensis, M. carolinensis, the blue-headed sawbill, is the only member of its genus or family found so far north as the Mexican border of the United States. Also Monotus, Baryphonus, and Protonotus. See monotus.

Blue-headed Sawbill (Monotus ceruleus).

Momus (mo'-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. Mōyos, a personification of μῦθος, blame, ridicule.] 1. In classical myth., a son of Night, the god of rail-lery and censure. He is said to have complained that the man made by Vulcan had not a window in his breast to let his thoughts be seen.

2. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds, of the family Trochilidae, the type of which is M. idae of Brazil. Mulsant and Verreaux, 1860.—A disciple or a son (or daughter) of Momus, a facetious or funny person; a wag, a clown in a circus.

"I do not think that Wickham is a person of very cheerful spirits, or what one would call a . . . "A daughter of Momus," Miss Tox softly suggested.

Dickens, Dombey and Son, viii.

mon¹, n. An obsolete form of monad.

mon² (mon), n. A dialectal (especially Scotch) form of man. See man, and compare mun².

mon³, v. i. Same as monn.

mon⁴ (mon), n. [Jap.] A personal crest, badge, or cogni-Tokugawa. Mon—that is, the mon of the Tokugawa family.

zance used in Japan and introduced into decoration of all sorts. For examples, see kiku-mon and kirimon.

mon⁵. See monn.

mona (mō-nā), n. [NL., < Sp. Fig. It. mona, a female monkey; see monkey.] An African monkey, Cercopithecus mona, of highly variegated coloration and docile disposition, often kept in captivity. See ent under Cercopithecus.

monacanth. An obsolete spelling of monacanth.

monacanthid (mon-a-kan'-thid), n. [< Gr. μονακάνθη, with one spine (see monacanthous) + -id.] Having uniserial adambulacral spines, as a starfish; distinguished from diplocanthid and polyacanthid.

Monacanthinae (mon-a-kan'-thi-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Monacanthus + -inae.] A subfamily of ballistoid fishes, typified by the genus Monacanthus. They have the anterior dorsal fin reduced to a single spine upon the head (whence the name), and have from 14 to 21 vertebrae (7 abdominal and 11 to 14 caudal). The subfamily includes a number of tropical and sub-tropical marine fishes, some of which are known as leatherjackets, on account of their villous coriaceous integuments.

monacanthine (mon-a-kan'-thin), a. and n. i. a. Of or pertaining to the Monacanthinae.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Monacanthinae.

monacanthous (mon-a-kan'-thus), a. [< Gr. μονακάνθος, with one spine or prickle, < μῦθος, single, + ἀκανθα, a spine or prickle; see acantha.] Having but one spine; monacanthine.

Monacanthus (mon-a-kan'-thus), n. [NL.: see monacanthous.] The typical genus of Monacanthinae, having a spine for a first dorsal fin. Cuvier, 1817. They are numerous in warm seas; M. ealestialis is West Indian, and is occasionally found on the southern coast of the United States.

Monacha (mon-a-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. μοναχός, single, solitary, < μῦθος, single; see monk.] 1. A genus of mollusks.—2. In ornith., same as Monasa. P. L. Slater, 1882.

Monachal (mon-a-kul), a. [Formerly also monacal; < OF. monachal, monacal, F. monacal = Sp. Pg. monacal = It. monacale, < ML. monachalis, of a monk, < L.L. monachus, a monk; see monk.]

monachism (mon'-a-kizim), n. [= F. monachisme = Sp. monaquismo = It. monachismo, < ML. monachismus, < L.L. monachus, monk-ery, < μῦθος, a monk; see monk.] 1. The principle of living in the manner of monks; the system or course of life pursued by monks and nuns; primarily, the practice of living alone in religious retirement from the world; religious seclusion; secondarily, the corporate life of religious communities under vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior. See monk.

The root-idea of monachism is . . . retirement from society in search of some ideal of life which society cannot supply, but which is thought attainable by abnegation of self and withdrawal from the world. This definition applies to all forms of monachism, . . . whether amongst Brahmins, Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Moslems, or the communitarian societies of the present day, even when theoretically anti-theological. This broad general conception of monachism is differentiated in the following ways:—It may take the form of absolute separation, so far as practicable, from all human intercourse, so as to give the whole life to solitary contemplation—the anchoritic type; or it may seek fellowship with kindred spirits in a new association for the same common end—the cenobitic type; it may abandon society as incurably corrupt, as a City of Destruction out of which the fugitive must flee absolutely—the Oriental view, for the most part; or it may consider itself as having a mission to influence and regenerate society—which has been, on the whole, and with minor exceptions, the Western theory of the monastic life.

2. A monastic characteristic or peculiarity; also, such characteristics collectively.

Flower of Worcester, Huntington, Simson of Durham, Havelton, Mathew of Westminster, and many others of obscure note, with all their monachisms.

Monachus (mon'-a-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μῦθος, single, solitary, L.L. monachus; see monk.] 1. In mammal., a genus of Phocidae, having four incisors above and below; the monk-seals. There are 2 species. M. albidus is the seal of the Mediterranean and Black Sea. M. tropicalis is the West Indian seal. Also called Pelagius and Heliophoca.

2. In ornith., a genus of warblers containing such as the common blackcap, Sylvia atricapilla. J. J. Kaup, 1820.—3. In entom., a large and important genus of leaf-beetles, erected by Suffrian in 1852. It is composed of small bluish beetles with or without red spots, and with the body very convex. There are about 100 species, all American, of which 4 belong to North America and the rest to more tropical regions.

monacid (mon-as'id), a. [< Gr. μῦθος, single, + E. acid.] Capable of saturating a single molecule of a monobasic acid: applied to hydroxids and basic oxids.

monact (mon-akt'), a. and n. [< Gr. μῦθος, single, + ἀκτίς, a ray.] I. a. Having only one ray; monactinal.

II. n. A monactinal sponges-spicule.

Of or pertaining to monks or nuns; belonging to or characteristic of monastic life, especially with reference to external relations or personal conduct; monastic; monkish: as, monachal morals; monachal austerity.

Robert de Brunne, to illustrate monachal morals, interspersed domestic stories; and . . . that rhyming monk affords the most ancient specimens of English tales in verse. J. D. Russell, Amen, of Lit., I. 208.

monachism (mon'-a-kizim), n. [= F. monachisme = Sp. monaquismo = It. monachismo, < ML. monachismus, < L.L. monachus, monk-ery, < μῦθος, a monk; see monk.] 1. The principle of living in the manner of monks; the system or course of life pursued by monks and nuns; primarily, the practice of living alone in religious retirement from the world; religious seclusion; secondarily, the corporate life of religious communities under vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior. II. n. A monactinal sponges-spicule.

monactinal (mo-nak'-ti-nal), a. [< monactine + -al.] Single-rayed; uniradiate, as a sponges-spicule.

monactine (mo-nak'-tin), a. [< Gr. μῦθος, single, + ἀκτίς (AKTIS), a ray.] Same as monactinal.

Monactinellinae (mo-nak'-ti-ne-lin-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῦθος, single, + ἀκτίς (AKTIS), a ray, + dim. -ella + -inae.] A group, subordinal or other, of fibrosiliceous or ceratossiliceous sponges, having comparatively little ceratode, the skeleton being mostly composed of single straight siliceous spicules, whence the name. The bread-crumb sponge, Haliclondria panicea, is a characteristic example. See Monactinella.

monactinelline (mo-nak'-ti-nel'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Monactinellinae.

monad (mon'-ad), n. and a. [= F. monade = Sp. monada = It. monada = L.L. monas (monad-), < Gr. μονάς (monad-), a unit, unity, as adj. solitary, single, < μῦθος (lonic μῦθος, Doric μῦθος, orig. μῦθος), alone, solitary, single, sole, only; appar. akin to μῦθος, fem. of μῦθος (mu-), one.] I. n. 1. In metaph., an individual and indivisible substance. The word was introduced into philosophy by Giordano Bruno to denote the minimum parts of substances supposed by him to be at once psychical and material. In the philosophy of Leibnitz the conception of the monad is that of an absolutely unextended substance existing in space, its existence consisting in its activities, which are ideas, and the universe was conceived by him as made up of such existences. The history of each monad follows an internal law, and all interaction between the monads is excluded; but there is a preestablished harmony between these laws for the different monads. (See Leibnitzism.) The Leibnitzian theory of the monad was, in many particulars, revived by Hermann Lotze.

Pythagoras his monads, so much talked of, were nothing else but corporeal atoms.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 14.

The soul is a monad (according to Bruno). It is never entirely without a body. God is the monad of monads; he is the minimum, because all things are external to him, and at the same time the maximum, since all things are in him. . . . The atoms of the ancients differed from one another in magnitude, figure, and position, but not qualitatively or in internal character. The monads of Leibnitz, on the contrary, are qualitatively differentiated by their ideas. All monads have ideas, but the ideas of the different monads are of different degrees of clearness. . . . God is the primitive monad; all other monads are its fulgurations. Cuvier, Hist. Philos. (tr. by Morris), II. 27.

2. In biol.: (a) Any simple single-celled organism. The name covers a great many similar but not necessarily related unicellular organisms, some of which are monads in sense (b), others being plants; others again are free flagellate cells representing an embryonic condition of some other organism or of wholly indeterminate character.

We are warranted in considering the body as a commonwealth of monads, each of which has independent powers of life, growth, and reproduction.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 403.

(b) In zool., specifically, a flagellate infusorian; one of the Infusoria flagellata, characterized by the possession of one or two long whip-like flagella, and generally exhibiting an endoplast and a contractile vacuole. The word in this sense is derived from the name of the genus Monas.—3. In chem., an element whose atoms have the lowest valence or atomicity, which valence is therefore taken as unity.

II. a. In chem. and biol., of or pertaining to monads; of the nature of a monad; monadiform.

Many monad metals give us their line spectra at a low degree of heat. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 124.

There is reason to think that certain organisms which pass through a monad stage of existence, such as the Myxomyces, are, at one time of their lives, dependent upon external sources for their protein matter, or are animals; and, at another period, manufacture it, or are plants. Huxley, Animal and Vegetable Kingdoms.

monad-deme (mon'-ad-dēm), n. [< monad + deme.] A colony or aggregate of undifferentiated monads.

Starting from the unit of the first order, the plastid or monad, and turning any undifferentiated aggregate a deme, we have a monad-deme. Eucy. Brit., XVI. 842.

monadelph¹ (mon'-a-delf), n. [< Monadelphus.] In bot., a plant whose stamens are united in one body or set by the filaments.

monadelph² (mon'-a-delf), n. [< Monadelphus.] In zool., a member of that division of mammals in which the uterus is single.

Monadelphia¹ (mon-a-del'-fi-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῦθος, alone, + ἀδελφία, brother: see adelpia.] The name given by Linnaeus to his sixteenth class of plants, comprising those that have their stamens united into one set by their filaments.

Monadelphia² (mon-a-del'-fi-ē), n. pl. An erroneous form for Monadelphus.

monadelphian (mon-a-del'-fi-an), a. [< Monadelphus + -an.] Same as monadelphous.

monadelphic (mon-a-del'-fik), a. [As Monadelphus + -ic.] Pertaining to a family consisting of a single individual.—Monadelphic form, in math., a form belonging to a monadelphic type.—Monadelphic type, in math., a type containing a single numerical parameter.

monadelphon (mon-a-del'-fon), n. [NL.: see Monadelphus.] In bot., an androecium of which the filaments are combined into a single column.

monadelphous (mon-a-del'-fus), a. [As monadelphus + -ous.] In bot., having the stamens united into one set by their filaments; belonging or relating to the class Monadelphia.

monadary (mō-nad'-i-ā-ri), n. pl. monadaries (-ries). [< NL. monadarius, < L.L. monas (monad-), a monad; see monad.] The common envelop of a colony of monads or monadiform infusorians.

monadic (mō-nad'-ik), a. [< Gr. μοναδικός, single, < μῦθος (monad-), a unit; see monad.] 1. Pertaining to monads; having the nature or character of a monad.—2. Single; not occurring in pairs. [Rare.]

So, too, we have the seven openings of the head, the three pairs of eyes, ears, and nostrils, with the agnathic mouth to make the seventh. J. Huxley, Nature, p. 322.

Monadelphus Fl. rec.

monadical (mō-nad'ī-kal), a. [Gr. monadikos + -al.] Same as monadic. Dr. H. More, Def. of Philosophic Cabbala, App., ix.
monadically (mō-nad'ī-kal-ī), adv. As a monad or unit; by ones.

Every number sublates monadically in unity.

T. Taylor, Trans. of Philosophic (1794), Int., p. xxxix.

Monadida (mō-nad'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + -ida.] The monads proper, a family of flagellate infusorians. These animals are naked or filicostate, and entirely free-swimming, with the flagellum single and terminal, no distinct oral aperture, an endoplast or nucleus, and usually one or more contractile vacuoles. Also Monadella.

monadiform (mō-nad'ī-fōrm), a. [LL. monas (monad-), a unit, + L. forma, form.] In biol., having the form or character of a monad; resembling a monad. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 96.

monadigerous (mon-a-dij'g-rus), a. [LL. monas (monad-) + L. gerere, carry: see -ger-, -gerous.] In zool., bearing or composed of monads or monadiform cells; as, the monadigerous layer of a sponge, which is the layer of cells lining the walls of the flagellated chambers of sponges. H. James Clark.

Monadina (mon-a-dī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + -ina.] Ehrenberg's name of the monads or flagellate infusorians now called Monadida.

monadine (mon'a-din), a. Of or pertaining to the Monadina or Monadida; having the character of a monad. Carpenter, Micros., § 418.

Monadines (mon-a-din'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Clenkowski), < Gr. μῡνᾰς (monad-), a unit, + in- + -es.] An order of fungi of the class Myrmecetes. They are slimy plants growing in moist places, frequently parasitic, and produce zoospores, sporocysts, plasmodia, sponges, and indurating spores, the zoospores emitting at maturity one to many zoospores or ameba-like bodies.

monadism (mon'a-diz-m), n. [= F. monadisme = Sp. monadismo; as monad + -ism.] 1. A philosophical system which accepts, in some form, the theory of monads; also, a theory of monads.

Not infrequently he [Leibnitz] introduces his theory of monadism by the argument that there must be simple substances since there are composite things, for the composite is only an aggregate of simple units.

E. Cant, Philos. of Kant, p. 36.

2. The application of the conception of the monad to the solution of the problems of chemistry and physics; atomism.

Of the different forms of the atomic theory, that of Roscovitch may be taken as an example of the p. roscovitchian. Encyc. L. A., III. 37.

monadology (mon-a-dol'ō-jī), n. [= F. monadologie, < Gr. μῡνᾰς (monad-), a unit (see monad), + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] In the philosophy of Leibnitz, the doctrine of monads; also, any similar metaphysical theory, as that of Lotze. See monad, 1.

Leibnitz's monadology may be a true system, but also it may not; and our faculties do not enable us to say whether it is or is not. Leibnitz, Stephen, Eng. Thought I, § 35.

Lotze, however, saves himself from a materialistic dualism through his monadology. Mind, XII. 560.

monal (mō-nāl'), n. Same as monad.

monamine (mon'an-in), n. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + E. amine.] One of a class of chemical compounds formed by substituting one or more alcohol radicals for the hydrogen in a single ammonia molecule. Monamines are primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen are replaced.

monanapestic (mon-an-a-pes'tik), a. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνασᾰρᾰς, anapest: see anapestic.] In anc. pros., containing but one anapest: not infrequently in logaedic meters. See monodactylic.

monander (mō-nan'dēr), n. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνᾰρ (androp-), man, male (in mod. bot. stamen). Cf. monandrous.] In bot., a plant having one stamen only.

Monandria (mō-nan'dri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνᾰρ (androp-), man, male (in mod. bot. stamen).] The first class in Linnaeus's system of plants, comprehending all genera with perfect flower, having only one stamen.

monandrian (mō-nan'dri-an), a. [Gr. μῡνᾰς + -an.] Same as monandrous.

monandrous (mō-nan'drus), a. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνᾰρ (androp-), man, male. In def. 2, cf. Monandria.] 1. In zool. and anthrop. (a) Having one male or husband; living in monandry; monogamous, as a female. (b) Relating to monandry: as, a monandrous system or custom.—2. In bot., having a single stamen; belonging to or having the characters of the class Monandria.

monandry (mō-nan'dri), n. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνᾰρ, man, male (in mod. bot. stamen).] The monandrous state; the practice of having only one husband.

Once introduced, monandry must necessarily spread in proportion as life becomes easier; for a man to have a wife to himself must be the respectable thing, and with this there will go a corresponding progress towards civilized ideas of conjugal fidelity. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 141.

monanthous (mō-nan'thus), n. [Gr. μῡνᾰς, single, + ἀνᾰρ, flower. In bot., producing but one flower: said of a plant or peduncle.

monarch (mon'ark), n. [Early mod. E. monarch; < OF. (and F.) monarque = Sp. monarca = Pg. monarca = It. monarca, < LL. monarcha, < Gr. μοναρχος, monarchos, ruling alone, a monarch, dictator, a sovereign (cf. μοναρχία, rule alone), < μῡνᾰς, alone, + ἀρχα, rule.] 1. The chief of a monarchy; a supreme governor for life, entitled variously emperor (or empress), king (or queen), czar (or czarina), sultan, shah, etc.; primarily, a sole or autocratic ruler of a state, but in modern times generally a hereditary sovereign with more or less limited powers. See monarchy.

It [mercy] becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown.
Shak., M. of V., IV. 1. 189.

The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch. Maistre, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 350.

2. Any possessor of absolute power or superiority; one who or that which holds a dominating or preeminent position, literally or figuratively: as, the oak is the monarch of the forest.

Come, then monarch of the vine,
Plump Bacchus with pink eye!
Shak., A. and C., II. 7 (song).

I am monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute.
Cowper, Alexander Selkirk.

—Syn. 1. King, etc. (see prince), potentate, autocrat, despot.

Monarcha (mō-nar'kē), n. [NL., < LL. monarcha, a monarch: see monarch.] An extensive genus of true flycatchers, of the family Muscicapidae, founded by Vigors and Horsfield in 1826. It contains about 25 species, especially characteristic of Australia, New Guinea, the Moluccas, and Polynesia. They are birds of brilliant and variegated coloration.

monarchal (mō-nar'kal), a. [= It. monarchale; as monarch + -al.] Of or pertaining to a monarch; befitting a monarch; sovereign.

The prince's persons being in all monarchal governments the very knot of the people's welfare.

Mr. P. Sidney, Arellia, v.

Katan, whom now transcendent glory raised Above his fellows, with monarchal pride, Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spoke:
Milton, P. L., II. 428.

monarchesst (mon'ar-kess), n. [Gr. monarch + -ess.] A female monarch; a queen or empress.

The monarchess of the four corners of earth Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, viii.

Rome, what made her such a Monarchess, but early the adventures of her youth, not in riots at home, but in dangers abroad?
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 197.

monarchia (mō-nar'ki-ā), n. [LL.: see monarchy.] In theol., same as monarchy, 5.

monarchial (mō-nar'ki-al), a. [LL. monarchia, monarchy (see monarchy), + -al.] Same as monarchical.

If all the evils which can arise among us from the republican form of our government, from this day to the day of judgment, could be put into a scale against what this country suffers from its monarchial form in a week, . . . the latter would be preponderant.

Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 206.

Monarchian (mō-nar'ki-an), n. [= F. monarchien = Pg. monarchiana; < Gr. μοναρχία, monarchy, monarchia; see monarchy and -an.] One of a body of Antitrinitarian Christians in the latter part of the second and the third century. They were divided into two groups—the dynamis (dynamistic) or rationalistic Monarchians, who regarded Christ as filled with a divine power and denied his divinity, and the Patristic Monarchians, who regarded the Father and the Son as the same; the latter were called modalistic Monarchians, from their advocacy of a threefold mode or manifestation of the deity.

By monarchians of the former (dynamistic) class Christ was held to be a mere man, miraculously conceived indeed, but constituted the Son of God simply by the infinitely high degree in which he had been filled with Divine wisdom and power.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

Monarchianism (mō-nar'ki-an-izm), n. [Gr. μοναρχισμός + -ism.] The theological doctrine respecting the Godhead maintained by the Monarchians.

Modalistic monarchianism, conceiving that the whole fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, took exception to the "subordinationism" of some church writers, and maintained that the names Father and Son were only two different designations of the same subject, the one God, who "with reference to the relations in which He had previously stood to the world is called the Father, but in reference to His appearance in humanity is called the Son."

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

monarchianistic (mō-nar'ki-an-ist'ik), a. [Gr. μοναρχιστικός + -istic.] Relating to or resembling the theory of the Monarchians.

Monarchianistic comparisons of Augustine.

Leibnitz, Hist. Philos. (trans.), I.

monarchic (mō-nar'kik), a. [F. monarchique = Sp. monarquico = Pg. monarchico = It. monarchico, < Gr. μοναρχικός, of a monarch or monarchial, < μοναρχος, a monarch; see monarch, monarchy.] Relating or pertaining to a monarch or to monarchy; monarchial.

The monarchic and aristocratical and popular partisans have been jointly laying their axes to the root of all government.

Burke, Wind of Nat. Society.

Without justice all forms, democratic or monarchic, are tyrannical alike.

Prætorius, Caesar, p. 190.

monarchical (mō-nar'ki-kal), a. [Gr. μοναρχικός + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or subject to a monarchy; characteristic of or subject to a monarch; of the nature of monarchy: as, monarchial rule or methods; a monarchial country or government.

Monarchical their State,
But prudently confined, and mingled with
Of each harmonious power. Thomas, Liberty, iv.

In a monarchial state in which the constitution is strong, the laws may be relaxed without danger.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, I.

It is not impossible that the political movements of our time, which seem on the surface to have a tendency to democracy, may have in reality a monarchial bias.

Marshall.

2. Of or pertaining to government by a monarch.

It was not the Monarchical way of Government that was as displeasing to God or Samuel; for their Government was of that Form already. Stillingfleet, Harmonia, II. iv.

3. Regarding monarchy as the best form of government; adhering to the principles of monarchy. The name Monarchical party was often applied to the Federalists of the United States by their opponents.

Also monarchial.

—Syn. See prince and royal.

monarchically (mō-nar'ki-kal-ī), adv. In the form of a monarchy, or in accordance with the principles or methods of monarchial government.

monarchise, monarchiser. See monarchize, monarchizer.

monarchism (mon'ar-kizm), n. [F. monarchisme = Sp. monarquismo; as monarch + -ism.] The principles of monarchy; love of or preference for monarchy.

monarchist (mon'ar-ki-ist), n. [F. monarchiste = Sp. monarquista = Pg. It. monarchista; as monarch + -ist.] An advocate of or believer in monarchy; one who holds or maintains monarchial principles.

I proceed to examine the next supposition of the church monarchists, which is, That Saint Peter's primacy with its rights and prerogatives was not personal but derivable to his successors.

Burton, On the Pope's Supremacy.

There is no Frenchman, be he Republican or Monarchist, who does not feel this insult.

Lower, Bismarck, II. 141.

monarchize (mon'ar-klz), v.; pret. and pp. monarchized, ppr. monarchizing. [= F. monarchiser; as monarch + -ize.] 1. Intrans. To play the king; act as a monarch.

Allowing him a breath, a little scene
To monarchize, he leav'd, and kill with looks.
Shak., Rich. II., III. 2. 106.

II. trans. 1. To rule over as a monarch.

By whom three sever'd Kingdoms in one shall firmly stand,
As Britain founding Brute first monarchized the Land.

Dryden, Polyolbion, v. 60.

2. To convert into a monarchy.

So far we shall be from mending our condition by monarchizing our Government, whatever new Council now possesses us.

Milton, Free Commonwealth.

[In all senses obsolete or unusual.]

Also spelled monarchize.

monarchizer (mon'ar-kl-izer), n. (One who plays the monarch, or upholds monarchy; a monarchist. Also spelled monarchiser. [Rare.]

Let the pride
Of these our irreligious monarchizers
Be crown'd in blood.
Heywood, Rape of Lucrece, III.

monarchy (mon'ār-ki), n.; pl. monarchies (-kiz). [Gr. monarchia = F. monarchie = Sp. monarquía = It. monarchia, < L.L. monarchia, < (Gr. monarxhā, absolute rule, sole power, monarchy, < μοναρχος, a sovereign, monarch: see monarch.) 1. Supreme power wielded by a single person; absolute personal authority.

They imagined that he (Jesus) . . . should subdue the rest of the world, and make Jerusalem the seat of an universal monarchy. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 16.

But let us not deceive our selves, the pretensions are as high and as great at Rome to this Monarchy as ever they were. Stillinger, Sermons, II. ii.

2. The principle of government by a monarch; the monarchical system.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the government of one ruling by just laws, called monarchy. Raleigh, Hist. World, I. ix. 2.

I hear there are people among you who think the experience of our governments has already proved that republican governments will not answer. Send those gentlemen here, to count the blessings of monarchy. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 221.

3. A government in which the supreme power is either actually or nominally lodged in the hands of a monarch or sole ruler, who holds his position for life, generally with hereditary succession. There have been elective monarchies, in which the successor to a deceased sovereign was chosen without obligatory regard to the hereditary principle; but this principle has finally prevailed, to the exclusion of choice, in all existing civilized monarchies. The former kingdom of Poland was a purely elective monarchy. The German-Roman empire was originally, and always nominally, elective; but for many centuries the chosen successor was almost invariably the heir of the former emperor. An absolute or despotic monarchy is one in which the will of the monarch or sovereign is supreme over all other authority or powers of government, a limited or constitutional monarchy, one in which the sovereign is limited to the exercise of particular powers or functions by the laws or constitution of the realm. More or less limited monarchies have nearly always existed. About the fifteenth century a noteworthy increase of the power of the sovereign took place (as in England under Edward IV., in France under Louis XI., in Spain under Ferdinand and the Catholic and Charles V.). Till the close of the eighteenth century the prevalent theory and practice on the continent constituted nearly unrestricted absolutism; this has now almost disappeared from Europe, while still maintaining a foothold in Asia. But whether absolute or limited, the monarch is theoretically regarded as the source of all power, and all acts of government are done in his name.

The obvious definition of a monarchy seems to be that of a state in which a single person, by whatever name he may be distinguished, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenue, and the command of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. Gibbon.

It has often indeed been noticed that a Feudal Monarchy was an exact counterpart of a Feudal Manor, but the reason of the correspondence is only now beginning to dawn upon us. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 77.

4. The territory ruled over by a monarch; a kingdom; an empire.

What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?
Shak., Rich. III., I. 4. 61.

5. In theol., the doctrine that there is in the Godhead only one principle (ἀρχή), cause (αἰτία), source or fountain (πηγή) of deity, namely God the Father, from whom the Son and the Holy Ghost derive their divinity. Also monarchia. Fifth Monarchy Men. See Asa.

Monarda (mō-nār'dā), n. [N.L. (Linnaeus, 1757), named after N. Monardes, a Spanish physician and botanist of the 16th century.] A genus of labiate plants, type of the tribe Monardeae, characterized by the anthers having fifteen nerves, which is almost equally five-toothed. They are odorless erect herbs with entire or toothed leaves, and quite large flowers arranged in a few terminal or whorled heads, surrounded by many bracts, and varying in color, being bright-red, purple, white, and in one species pale-yellow. About 7 species are known, all natives of North America. M. punctata, the American horsemint, is stimulant and carminative. M. didyma, the Oswego tea, or bee-balm, has bright-scarlet flowers. M. fistulosa is the wild bergamot.

Monardea (mō-nār'dē-ā), n. pl. [N.L. (Ben-tham, 1833), < Monarda + -ea.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Labiata, characterized by having two perfect ascending stamens, in which one-cell of each anther is either wanting or separated from the other. It embraces 11 genera, Monarda being the type, and about 490 species, the majority of which are widely scattered throughout the temperate and warmer regions of the earth.

monardin (mō-nār'din), n. [Monarda + -in.] A crystalline solid which separates from the oil of horsemint, Monarda punctata. It is isomeric with thymol.

monarsenous (mon-ār'se-nus), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀρσεν, male.] In zool., having but one male for several females.

monarticular (mon-ār'tik'ū-lār), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄρτι, a joint; see articular.] In pathol., affecting a single joint.

monas (mon'as), n. [N.L., < L.L. monas, a unit; see monad.] 1. A monad; a monadiform infusorian. 2. [cap.] The typical genus of Monadidae. M. lens is an example. — Monas prodigiosa, Bacillus prodigiensis. This microscopic organism forms short rods, it is not pathogenic, but is found on starchy substances, such as bread, rice, and potatoes, also on milk. It produces a red pigment, and it or the substance which it discolors are sometimes called blood-rot, bleeding bread, bleeding hot, and red milk.

Monasa (mon'as-ā), n. [N.L. (Vieillot, 1816), an error for Monacha; see Monacha.] A genus of South American barbets or puff-birds, of the family Bucconidae; the nun-birds or monasas. There are seven species, of comparatively large size, with somber blackish plumage usually relieved with white on the face or wings and coral red bills, as M. nigrā, M. superba, and M. nerythra. Also Monada, Monader, Monacha, Lupornis, and Seothecaria. See cut at nun-bird.

Monascidia (mon-as'id-i-ā), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. μόνος, alone, + N.L. Ascidia.] A superfamily group of tunicates, the Ascidae simplices; the sea-squirrels; simple and either solitary or social ascidians.

monascidian (mon-as'id-i-ān), a. and n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + F. ascidian.] 1. a. Simple, as an ascidian; a monad; not composite or compound, as many ascidians are; or of pertaining to the Monascidia.

2. n. A member of the Monascidia; an ordinary sea-squirrel.

monase (mon'as), n. [F. monase, N.L. Monasa; see Monasa.] A fissirostral barbet of the genus Monasa; a nun-bird.

monaster (mon-as'tēr), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀστήρ, star.] In embryol., the original aster or single-star figure which occurs in the process of eurycoelosis; the mother-star of the nucleolus; distinguished from duster or dyaster.

monasterial (mon-as'tēr-i-āl), a. [= Sp. monasterial = It. monasteriale, < L.L. monasterialis, of a monastery, < monasterium, a monastery; see monastery.] Of or pertaining to a monastery.

One of the bishops had been in solitary confinement in this monasterial prison 17 years. The Century, XXXV. 56, note.

monasterially (mon-as'tēr-i-āl-i), adv. Monasterially.

It is not the habit that makes the monk, many being monasterially accounted who inwardly are nothing less than monachal.

Uquhart, tr. of Rabelais, I. Author's Pref. (Daries.)

monastery (mon'as-tēr-i), n.; pl. monasteries (-riz). [In early form minster, q. v.; = F. monastère = Sp. monasterio = It. monastero = It. monasterio = Pol. monasterz = Hung. monastor (< Slav.), < L.L. monasterium, < (Gr. μοναστήριον, a solitary dwelling, in LGr. a monastery, cf. LGr. μοναχικός, adj., (Gr. μοναχός, a solitary, LGr. a monk, < μονάξω, to alone, dwell alone, < μόνος, alone; see monad.) Y. monk, from the same ult. source.] A house or other place of residence occupied in common by persons seeking religious seclusion from the world; commonly applied to such a house exclusively used by monks. The term, however, strictly includes the abbey, the priory, the nunnery, and the friary, and in this broad use is synonymous with convent. Monasteries in the Christian church were probably first established in the fourth century. St. Benedict of Nursia in the sixth century established a monastic rule which has been the foundation of nearly all the rules which govern monastic vows. Vows under different rules were made from the beginning of Christianity. The number of monasteries in Europe was much diminished at the Reformation, when their rich estates were in part appropriated by sovereigns to their own use, and in part transferred to universities and other educational institutions, etc. We owe to the monasteries the first definite beginnings or revival of civilization in many countries, especially Germany and France, almost all the missionary work of the early middle ages, and the preservation of nearly all ancient classical and early medieval literature. The monastic life has been practised from pre-Christian times among the Buddhists. See rule.

The hypocrites hath loste their more than princely habitacions, theyr monasteries, conventes, hospitales, prebendaries and chantries, with theyr fatte fedying and warme couches, fory gotten good wyl home agayne.

Sp. Bale, Image of the Two Churches, I.

Abbeville is a goodly faire Citie, . . . wherein . . . are many Monasteries of men and women.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 12.

The ancient Monastery's hall
A solemn, huge, and dark red pile Placed on the margin of the lake.

Scott, Marmion, II. 9.

The eastern monasteries, with the important exception of a vow of obedience, differed little from a collection of hermitages. They were in the desert; the monks commonly lived in separate cells; they kept silence at their repasts; they rivalled one another in the extravagance of their penances. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 121.

Mitered monastery. See miter. — Monasteries' Dissolution Acts, English statutes of 1536 and 1539, vesting in the king certain monasteries and other religious houses, and the rights and property belonging to them.

monastic (mō-nas'tik), a. and n. [F. monastique = Sp. monástico = It. monastico, < (LGr. μοναχικός, living in solitude, pertaining to a monk, < μοναχός, a monk; see monastery.) 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of monks or nuns; ascetic; as, monastic life, vows, or practices.

The clergy, and the monastic orders especially, had been good farmers. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 464.

2. Adapted to or suitable for monks or nuns; of ascetic character or use; as, monastic buildings or architecture; monastic seclusion.

To forswear the full stream of the world, and to live in a nook merely monastic. Shak., As you Like It, III. 2. 442.

The grounds of the villa, raised on the ancient walls of the monastic precinct, look down at once on the waves of Hadria. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 295.

3. An epithet noting a style of book-decoration in which medieval forms of compact ornament are strongly stamped on the sides or back of the book without any use of gold-leaf. — Monastic bishop, in the ancient Celtic churches of Ireland and Scotland, and sometimes in other countries in the earlier middle ages:—(a) an abbot who was also a bishop; or (b) a monk consecrated bishop, resident in a monastery, and exercising his office in confirmations, ordinations, etc., but without jurisdiction. — Monastic vows, the vows imposed under monastic rule. They are three in number, poverty, chastity, and obedience.

II. n. A monk; a religious recluse.

An art . . . preserved amongst the monastics. Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 143.

It seems plain that the treble value was intended specially to protect the new monastics in their tithes by heightening the peril of disputing them.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

monastical (mō-nas'ti-kal), a. [Gr. monastic + -al.] Same as monastic.

monastically (mō-nas'ti-kal-i), adv. In a monastic manner; in a retired manner; after the manner of monks. Scifi.

monasticism (mō-nas'ti-sizm), n. [Gr. monastic + -ism.] 1. The corporate life of religious communities under the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; the monastic system or condition.

It may be questioned whether anything but monasticism could have kept the church and clergy free from the political combinations and dangers of the early time.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 64.

2. The condition or state of living like a monk, in religious retirement from the world.

In older Anglo-Saxon Britain monasticism itself had but seldom aspired after the dreamy quietude of the East or the passionate and exensive asceticity of the West: it was a religious profession, no more.

Milman, Latin Christianity, vii. 1.

monasticon (mō-nas'ti-kon), n. [LGr. μοναστήριον, neut. of μοναχικός, monastic; see monastic.] A book relating to or describing monasteries.

monē-plust, n. pl. An obsolete variant of mun-plins.

moner (mō-nēr), n. [< NL. moneron, q. v.] An organism having the form of a non-nucleated protoplasmic body, in which no definite structure can be discerned. The moners consist of indifferent protoplasm containing no nucleus or endoplast, and thus are conveniently, if not naturally, distinguished from the higher series of protozoans known as Eudiplodia.

Monera (mō-nē-rā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of moneron.] 1. Haeckel's name of a class of protozoans of the simplest possible characters. The Monera are apparently structureless particles of protoplasm, agreeing with other rhizopoda in protruding pseudopods, but differing from the normal amoeboids in lacking any recognizable nucleus. Unlike foraminifera, they form no shell. The group is provisional, and perhaps hypothetical. The name is that of a legitimate biological conception, but since it is by no means certain that every moner is not a stage or state of a somewhat more definitely organized rhizopod, the group is named has no assured zoological standing. The Monera are sometimes nominally divided into Cyanomonera and Lepidomonera, the former of which are always naked, while the latter may acquire a cell-wall. Also Monerops.

2. [L. c.] Plural of moneron.

moneral (mō-nēr'al), a. [< Monera + -al.] Same as moneran.

monerism (mon'ēr-jizm), n. [< Gr. monos, single, + lypon, = F. work (see erg), + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine that the Holy Spirit is the only efficient agent in regeneration—that the human will possesses no inclination to holiness until regenerated, and therefore cannot cooperate in regeneration.

moneric (mō-nēr'ik), a. [< Monera + -ic.] Same as moneran. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 394.

moneron (mō-nēr'on), n.; pl. monera (-rā). [NL., irreg. < Gr. monērion, single, solitary, < monos, single (see monad), + epiplanctus (√ ap), join, fit (cf. deipnē, doubly fitted).] A moner.

Each individual living particle of this structureless mass (protoplasm) is called a Moneron. Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), II, 21.

To put his [Haeckel's] views into a few words, he conceives that all forms of life originally commenced as monera, or simple particles of protoplasm, and that these moners originated from not living matter. Huxley.

Monerosos (mō-nērō-sōs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. moneros, single, solitary (see moneron), + ζῷον, an animal.] Same as Monera. Haeckel.

monerosoan (mō-nērō-sō'an), a. and n. [< Monerosos + -an.] 1. A. Of or pertaining to the Monera or Monerosos.

II. n. A moner or moneron.

monerosic (mō-nērō-sō'ik), a. [< Monerosos + -ic.] Same as monerosoan. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 473.

monerula (mō-nēr'ū-lā), n.; pl. monerulae (-lā). [NL., dim., < Gr. monērion, single, solitary: see moneron.] In embryol., a name given by Haeckel to a supposed non-nucleated stage of an impregnated ovum, when it has the form-value of a simple cytode, or moner.

It is supposed that the nucleated ovum, immediately upon fecundation by spermatozoa, undergoes retrogressive metamorphosis, loses its nucleus, and becomes a mere mass of protoplasm, that then a new nucleus is formed, in the formation of which the spermatic protoplasm takes part; and that thereupon the ovum resumes its form-value of a nucleated cell as a cytula, having been a monerula in the interval between the loss of the original nucleus and the acquisition of the new one. The word is one of a series, other members of which are cytula, monerula, blastula, and gastrula.

Moneses (mō-nē'sez), n. [NL. (Salisbury, 1821), prob. so named on account of the proty and solitary flower; < Gr. monos, alone, + εἶς, delight.] A genus of plants of the natural order Eriocarpaceae and the tribe Pyroleae, characterized by spreading petals, by the capsule opening upward from the base, and by solitary flowers.

There is but a single species, M. uniflora, the one-flowered pyrola, which is a small perennial with rounded and velvety serrate leaves and a stem bearing a white or rose-colored flower. It is a native of middle and northern Europe, the colder parts of America, and Japan.

monesia (mō-nē'si-ā), n. [Origin uncertain.] A vegetable extract thought to be derived from the bark of Chrysophyllum glycyphllum, exported from Brazil in hard thick cakes. It seems to have some stomachic, alterative, and astringent properties.—Monesia bark. See Chrysophyllum.

monesin (mō-nē'sin), n. [< monesia + -in.] An acid principle obtained from monesia, and considered identical with saponin.

money (mun-i), n. [Formerly also mony, monde; < ME. monye, monne, monye, < OF. monete, monete, monnyne, F. monnaie = Fr. Sp. moneda = Pg. moeda = It. moneta, < L. moneta, a mint, money; see mint, which is also ult. from L. moneta, and thus a doublet of money.] 1. Coin, or, more strictly, current coin; stamped metal that may be given in exchange for commodities; gold, silver, or other metal, stamped by public authority and used as the medium of exchange; in this sense used only collectively.

Forthe thei went alle thre To pay the schipper his mone. MS. Candab. VI v. 48, l. 65. (Halliwell.)

Every man also gave him a piece of money. Job xlii, 11.

2. In a wider sense, any article of value which is generally accepted as a medium of exchange; also, by extension, something which, though possessing little or no intrinsic value, is recognized and accepted as a substitute for money as above defined, such as paper money; any circulating medium of exchange. Money is adopted for the sake of convenience to facilitate the exchange of one kind of wealth for another and as a standard of value. Its common form is that of a stamped metallic currency; but in primitive times, among uncivilized peoples, and under special conditions by civilized people, many other articles have been used as money. Bank-notes, greenbacks, gold and silver certificates of the United States government, etc., all representing coin, are called paper money, and are used for convenience instead of the coin.

itself. Money in this sense is not often used in the plural, unless to indicate sums of money or different systems of money or coinage. See def. 1.

Importune him for my money. Shak., T., of A., II. 1. 16.

Every lady should meet her lord,
When he is in my court true sea;
Some will hawk, and some will hounds,
And other some will gay make.

The Knight's Quest (Child's Ballads, I. 216).

What money I have is at your disposal; and upon twelve I will meet you at the palace with it.

Ben. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, II. 2.

There are several different sorts of paper money, but the circulating notes of banks and bankers are the species which is best known, which seems best adapted for this purpose.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, II. II.

Money is bought and sold like other things whenever other things are bought and sold for money. Whoever sells corn, or tallow, or cotton, buys money.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ. III. viii. § 2.

Our ancestors in Maryland and Virginia, before the revolutionary war, and for some time after, in default of gold and silver, used tobacco as money, made it money by law, reckoned the fees and salaries of government officers in tobacco, and collected the public taxes in that article.

Cyr. of Pol. Sci., II. 570.

Money is the medium of exchange. Whatever performs this function, does this work, is money, no matter what it is made of, and no matter how it came to be a medium at first, or why it continues to be such.

Walker, Pol. Econ., III. III. 144.

With the aid of money all the difficulties of barter disappear; for money consists of some commodity which all people in the country are willing to receive in exchange, and which can be divided into quantities of any amount. Almost any commodity might be used as money in the absence of a better material. In agricultural countries corn was so used in former times.

Jerome, Pol. Econ., p. 104.

3. Property, in whatever form, which is readily convertible into or serves the same purposes as money as above defined; available assets; wealth; as, a man of money.

The money on this mode that men so faine holden,
Tol me to whom that treasure appendeth.

Piers Plowman (A), l. 43.

Money can neither open new avenues to pleasure, nor block up the passages of anguish.

Johnson.

Money, taken in the largest sense, as the representative of all kinds of property, is one of the greatest means of human education.

J. F. Clarke, Salt Culture, p. 260.

4. The currency of any country or nation; a denomination or designation of value, whether represented in the coinage or not; in this sense also used in the plural: as, English money; the weights and measures of different nations; a money of account.

For sight als that bight them fro
For thrifty penks of thair money,
So war that add to thair enemy
Euer thrifty lewis for a peny.

Holy Rood (F. E. T. S.), p. 80.

Words are the tokens current and accepted for conceits, as money are for values.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 235.

5. A way or line of investing money. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

I sell dry fruit, sir, in February and March, because I must be doing something, and green fruit's not my money then.

Mayer, London Labour and London Poor, I. 95.

Acknowledgment money. See acknowledgment.—Added money. See add.—Bent money, bowed money, a coin purposely bent and given as a love-token, or in certain cases used as a votive offering. Such coins seem to have been bent to prevent their use as money.

I am not furnish'd with the present money.

Shak., I. of E., IV. 1. 34.

Ready money, money paid or ready to be paid at the time a transaction is completed, cash; also used adjectively: as, a ready-money purchase.

Hee is your slave while you pay him ready Money, but if hee once befriend you, your Tyrant, and you had better deserve his hate than his trust.

H. N. Woodward, Micro cosmographie, A Shop keeper.

Let's on compound, and for the Present Live, Tie all the Ready Money Fate can give.

Cowley, Pindaric Odes, VIII. 6.

Right money, money paid as the condition or consideration of acquiring a right to the purchase of lands.

As no right money is to be paid for these lands, and quitrent of two shillings sterling a hundred, demandable some years hence only, it is highly presumable that they will always be held upon a more desirable footing than where both these are laid on with a very heavy hand.

Washington, quoted in H. N. Adams, Washington's [Interest in Western Land].

Soft money, paper money. [Slang, U. S.]—To coin money. See coin.—Token money. See token.—To make money to gain or procure money; become rich.—To take eggs for money. See egg.—Value of money. See the quotation.

It will be well to deal with a use of the phrase value of money which has led to much confusion. In mercantile phraseology the value of money means the interest charged for the use of loanable capital. Thus, when the market rate of interest is high, money is said to be dear, when it is low, money is regarded as cheap. Whatever may be the force of the reasons in favour of this use, it is only mentioned here for the purpose of excluding it. For our present subject, the value of a thing is what it will exchange for; the value of money is what money will exchange for, or its purchasing power. If prices are low, money will buy much of other things, and is of high value. The value of money is inversely as general prices, falling as they rise and rising as they fall.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 721.

White money, silver coin; also, coin of base metal imitating silver.

Here's a scull'd bag of a hundred; which indeed
Are counters all, only some sixteen groats
Of white money's mouth on't.

Ben. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, II. 1.

(See also earned money, hard money, light money, pin money, shop money.) Syn. 1 and 2. Money, Cash. Money was primarily coined metal, as copper, brass, silver, gold, but later any circulating medium that took the place of such coins, as wampum was used as money in trade with the Indians, paper money, Cash is ready money, primarily coin, but now also anything that is accepted as money; it is opposed to credit.

Thievery needs no more than the name to prove it a water of death. . . . a sin which usurers and money-mongers do bitterly rail at. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 155.

money-mongering (mun'i-mung'gér-ing), n. Dealing with money (in a grasping way). Darwin.

The last place in which he will look for the cause of his misery is in that very money-mongering to which he now clings as frantically as ever. Kingdley, Yonst, xv.

money-order (mun'i-ór'dér), n. An order, payable at sight, granted, upon payment of the sum and a small commission, by one post-office, and payable at another.—Money-order office. (a) In the United States, a division of the post-office department of the government, the office of the superintendent of the money-order system. (b) A money-order post-office.—Money-order post-office. In the United States, a post-office designated by the Postmaster-General to issue and pay money-orders.

money-pot (mun'i-pót), n. A money-box, especially of earthenware, from which coins can be taken only by breaking the vessel.

money-scrivener (mun'i-skriv'ér), n. A person who raises money for others; a money-broker.

Suppose a young inexperienced man in the hands of money-scriveners; such fellows are like your wire-drawing mills: if they get hold of a man's finger, they will pull in his whole body at last. Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull.

money-spider (mun'i-spi'dér), n. A small spider of the family Attidae, Epiblemus a. nicum, of common occurrence in North America, supposed to prognosticate good luck or the receipt of money to the person it crawls on.

money-spinner (mun'i-spin'ér), n. Same as money-spider.

money's-worth (mun'iz-wérth), n. 1. Something as good as money, or that will bring money.

There is either money or money's worth in all the controversies of life. Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. Full value; something that is worth what one pays for it.

money-taker (mun'i-tā'kér), n. 1. One whose office it is to receive payments of money; especially, a doorkeeper at some public place who receives the money for admissions.—2. One who is open to bribery.

Sayth master money-taker, greed F th' flat.
"And if tho[u] comst in danger, for a noble Th' stand thy friend." Times Whistle (E. E. T. 8.) p. 48.

moneywort (mun'i-wér't), n. The creeping herb Lysimachia Nummularia: so called from its round leaves. See Lysimachia, creeping-jenny, and herb-treepener. The name is given also to several other plants, as Thymus chamaedrys, Anapallis tenella, etc.—Cornish moneywort, Sedum Europa.

mong (mung), n. [Also mang: < ME. mong, mang; < AS. gemang, gemong, a mingled throng, crowd, assembly, esp. in the phrase on gemang, on gemong, or simply gemang, gemong (= OS. on gemange), among; see among and ming.] 1. Mixture; association.

Ich rabbe no mong . . . with the world. Old Eng. Hom. (ed. Morris), I. 155.

2. A mixture of grain; a mixture of barley ground up with husks for feeding swine; a mash of bran and malt. Also mong. [Prov. Eng.]

mong, v. [< ME. mongen, mungen; < AS. mangan, gemangan (= Icel. manga), trade, traffic

(cf. Icel. mang, trade, business); appar. < L. mango, a trader, slave-dealer, but in form at least associated with gemang, gemong, a mingled throng, crowd; see mong.] I. intrans. To trade; traffic. Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull.

mongcorn, n. [Also muncorn; < ME. mong-corn; < wong + corn.] Same as mungcorn.

monger (mung'gér), n. [< ME. monger, mongere, mangere; < AS. mangere (= MD. mangher, menger, D. mangelaar = MHG. menger, manger, LG. monger, menger, manger = OHG. mangari, mengari, MHG. mangare, mengare = Icel. mangari), a trader, dealer, merchant, < mangan, gemangan, trade; see mong.] 1. A trader; a dealer: now used only or chiefly in composition: as, fishmonger, ironmonger. It is often used allusively, implying a petty or discreditable traffic or activity, as in scandal-monger, mutton-monger, whoremonger.

Godfrey the garlick-mongere. Piers Plowman (C), vii. 373.

This chanon has a brave pate of his owne! A shaven pate! A right monger, y'faith! This was his plot. B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, II. a.

2. A small kind of trading-vessel. Rhont.

monger (mung'gér), v. t. [< monger, n.] To traffic in; deal in; make merchandise of: chiefly used in composition with its object, and often implying a petty and discreditable traffic.

The folly of all motive-mongering. Coleridge.

Monge's equation. See equation.

Mongol (mong'gol), n. and a. [= F. Mongol = Ar. Pers. Hind. Mughal (> E. Mogul), < Mongolian Mongol. Said to be ult. < mong, brave.]

I. n. One of an Asiatic race now chiefly resident in Mongolia, a vast region north of China proper and south of Siberia, forming a possession of China. Mongols are also found elsewhere in the Chinese empire and in Siberia, etc. The Mongols in the thirteenth century conquered a large part of Asia and overran eastern Europe. See Mogul.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Mongolia or the Mongols.

Mongolian (mong-gó'li-an), a. and n. [< Mongol + -ian.] I. a. Same as Mongol. Mongolian race, the second in Blumenbach's classification of the races of mankind. The chief characteristics are: an oblong skull flattened at the sides, broad cheek bones, low retreating forehead, short and broad nose, and yellowish complexion. It included the Chinese, Turks, Tartars, Indo-Chinese, Lapps, Eskimos, etc. Mongolian subregion, in zoology, a subdivision of the great Palearctic region, stretching eastward from the Caspian Sea to include most if not all of Japan, and lying south of the Siberian subregion; but its boundaries are not well defined. In ornithology this subregion has more peculiar genera than any other one of the Palearctic subdivisions.

II. n. 1. Same as Mongol.—2. By extension, a Chinese, or member of the Mongolian race (according to Blumenbach's classification).—3. The language of the Mongols, a branch of the Ural-Altaic family. It has three principal dialects—Kalmuck, East Mongolian, and Burjat.

Mongolic (mong-gó'lik), a. [= It. Mongolico; as Mongol + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mongols; Mongolian.

Mongolid (mong-gó'li-d), n. pl. [NL. < Mongol + -ida.] The Mongols and races regarded as akin to them, according to the classification of certain authorities.

Mongoloid (mong-gó'li-oid), a. and n. [< Mongol (Mongolian) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling the Mongols; having Mongolian characteristics. II. n. One having physical characteristics like those of the typical Mongols (including Chinese, Japanese, etc.). Huxley.

Mongoloid (mong-gó'li-oid), a. and n. [< Mongol + -oid.] Same as Mongoloid.

mongoo, mongoo (mong'-, mung'gós), n. [Also written mongoo, mongoo; mongoo, mongoo, mongoo, mongoo, etc.; < F. mongoo, NL. specific name mongoo; < Telugu mangiu, Marathi mangus, a mongoo.] 1. A common ichneumon of India, Herpesia griseus. Being easily domesticated, it is kept in many houses in Hindustan to rid them of reptiles and other vermin, as rats, snakes, etc. It has been said that it neutralizes the poison of snakes, which it fearlessly attacks, by calling, during its contacts with them, the Ophephanta mongoo, but its immunity is really due to the extreme celerity of its movements. It is of a gray color, decked with black, and about the size of a cat. The name is commonly extended to all the related ichneumons of the subfamily Herpesiinae, of which there are several genera and many species; and also to some of the Pterininae. All these belong to one family, Pterinidae. See Herpesia, and cut at ichneumon.

2. A species of lemur or maki, Lemur mongoz, having a white color and the tail not ringed: also called mongoo lemur. See maki.

mongrel (mung'grél), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also mongrel, mongrel, mongrill, mongrel; < late ME. mongrell for mengerel, mongerel, < mang, mong, a mixture (see mong), + -erel, a double dim. (-er², -el²), as in cockerel, pickorel, etc.] I. n. 1. An individual or a breed of animals resulting from repeated crossing or mixture of several different varieties; the progeny of varieties, and especially of artificial varieties, as distinguished from the hybrid, or cross between two different species (but the distinction is not always observed).

This greater variability in mongrels than in hybrids does not seem at all surprising. For the parents of mongrels are varieties, and mostly domestic varieties. . . . and this implies that there has been recent variability, which would often continue and be added to that arising from the act of crossing. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 261.

2. Specifically, a dog of mixed breed.

Hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, shoughs, water-rugs, and doul wolves are clapt All by the name of dogs. Shak., Macbeth, III. 1. 98.

The Ounce or wild cat is as big as a Mongrel. S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 33.

3. Anything of mixed breed; anything that is a mixture of incongruous elements.

They say they are gentlemen, But they shew mongrels. Shak. (and another), Sea Voyage, IV. 1.

Dioclesian the Emperor bestowed Elephants and the parties adjoining on the Beni and Nobata, whose Religion was a mongrel of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their own. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 568.

His two faculties of serving man and solicitor should compound into one mongrel. Milton, Colasterion.

II. a. Of a mixed or impure breed; begotten or made up of different kinds: usually in a disreputable sense.

There is a mongrel dialect, composed of Italian and French, and some Spanish words are also in it; which they call France. Huvel, Forceline Travell, p. 53.

It was hard to imagine Richard Jekyll . . . partaking of amorous dalliance from the same dish with a mongrel gipsy. J. W. Palmer, After his Kind, p. 224.

mongrelt, v. t. [Formerly also mongrel, monngrel, < mongrel, n.] To make mongrel; mongrelize.

Shal our blood be mongrelt with the corruption of a struggling French? Mardon, What you Will, I. 1.

mongrelism (mung'grél-izim), n. [< mongrel + -ism.] Mixture of different breeds; the being of mixed breeds.

He [F. Galton] continued his experiments [of transfusion of blood in rabbits] on a still larger scale for two more generations, without any sign of mongrelism showing itself in the very numerous offspring. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 280.

mongrelize (mung'grél-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mongrelized, pp. mongrelizing. [< mongrel + -ize.] To make mongrel; give a mongrel nature or character to.

How . . . comes it that such a vast number of the seedlings are mongrelized? I suspect that it must arise from the pollen of a distinct variety having a prepotent effect over a flower's own pollen, and that this is part of the general law of good being derived from the intercrossing of distinct individuals of the same species. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 101.

mongrel-akate (mung'grél-akát), n. The angel fish, Squatina angelus. [Local, Eng.]

monial, n. [ME., < OF. moniale, a nun, fem. of monial, monastic, < monne, a monk; see monk.] A nun.

Monks and moniales, that monishous sholden fynde, Han mad here kyn knyghtes. Piers Plowman (C), vi. 76.

monial, n. Same as monial.

monicon, n. Same as monicon.

monied, a. See monied.

moniert, n. An obsolete form of moneyer.

monies, n. An erroneous plural of money, sometimes used.

monilated (mon'il-lā-téd), a. [< L. monile, a necklace, + -at + -ed.] Having alternate swellings and contractions, like a string of beads; moniliform.

There is an acrosy gland composed of dichotomous monilated tubes. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 263.

monilicorn (mōn'il'i-kōrn), a. and n. [< L. monile, necklace, + cornu = E. horn.] I. a. Having monilated or moniliform antennae, as an insect: specifically, of or pertaining to the Monilicornes. See cut under moniliform.

II. n. A monilicorn beetle.

Monilicornes (mō-nīl-i-kōr'nez), n. pl. [NL., < L. monile, a necklace, + cornu = E. horn.] A group of moniliferous beetles; the fourth of five tribes into which Swainson divided the order Coleoptera, composed of five families, Cassida, Chrysomelidae, Clytridae, Erotidae, and Hispidae. [Not in use.]

moniliform (mō-nīl'i-fōrm), a. [L. monile, necklace, + forma, form.] Resembling a string of beads: applied in zoology and botany to organs, vessels, stems, roots, poets, etc., which have a series of beady swellings alternating with constrictions. Also moniloid.

In most Polychaeta the intestine acquires . . . merely a moniliform appearance. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 267.

moniliformly (mō-nīl'i-fōrm-lī), adv. In a moniliform manner; in the form of a string of beads.

moniloid (mō-nīl'i-oid), a. [L. monile, a necklace, + Gr. idōs, form.] Same as moniliform.

moniment, n. An obsolete variant of monument.

Monimia (mō-nīm'i-ē), n. [NL. (Du Petit-Thouars, 1804), suggested by its affinity to a genus previously named Mithridatea, < L. Monima, < Gr. Mithra, wife of Mithridates.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, type of the natural order Monimaceae and of the tribe Monimieae. It is characterized by globose dioecious flowers, the staminate becoming split into four to six lobes, by numerous stamens, each bearing two glands at its base, and by the fruit, which consists of several very small one-seeded drupes enclosed within the enlarged perianth. Three species are known, natives of the Mascarene Islands. They are shrubs with rigid opposite leaves, and very small flowers, closely clustered in the axils. Fossil plants of this genus occur in the Tertiary formations of Europe and of Australia, and closely allied forms, called Monimiopsis, at the very base of that formation in France and in the Fort Union group on the Yellowstone river in Montana.

Monimiacae (mō-nīm-i-ā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Monimia + -aceae.] A natural order of dicotyledonous plants of the apetalous series Micromyces, typified by the genus Monimia. It is characterized by a globose or cup-shaped perianth, toothed or deeply divided at the border, by numerous stamens covering the perianth, and by having several or many distinct ovaries, each with a single ovule, a minute embryo, and copious fleshy albumen. The order includes about 32 genera and 150 species, natives of the warmer parts of South America, Asia, and the South Pacific Islands. They are trees, shrubs, or rarely climbers, generally aromatic, with rigid opposite leaves and small flowers, in axillary or sometimes terminal clusters, which are shorter than the leaves. Several furnish wood for building and cabinet-work, or leaves used as a tonic or an aromatic seasoning.

Monimieae (mō-nīm-i-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1800), < Monimia + -eae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Monimiacae, of which Monimia is the type. It is characterized by having pendulous ovaries and anthers opening by a longitudinal fissure (instead of uplifting valves as in the other tribe of the order, Atheropomaeae). It includes 8 genera, natives of tropical America, Australia, and adjacent islands, with one genus in Africa.

monimostylic (mō-nī-mōs'tīl'ik), a. [Gr. monimos, lasting, stable, + stilos, pillar.] Having the quadrato bone fixed, as a skull: correlated with autostylic and hyostylic.

monilour, n. A Middle English form of moneyer.

monipiles (mō-nī-pliz), n. sing. and pl. Same as manipiles. [Scotch.]

monish (mōn'ish), v. t. [ME. monysshēn, monyschen, monishen, also moneston, < OF. monester, < ML. monistare, for L.L. monitare, freq. of L. monere, warn, admonish, akin to meminisse, remember. Cf. admonish, monition, etc.] To admonish; warn.

* For I yow pray and eke moneste Nought to refusen our requeste.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 3579.

Of father Anchises these goads and grisly resemblances . . .
In sleep mee monisheth, with visage buggish he feareth.

Shamuraz, Knied, iv. 172.

I write not to hurte any, but to profit som; to accuse none, but to monish such.

Ascham, The scholemaster, p. 55.

monisher (mōn'ish-er), n. [ME. monyschere; < monish + -er.] An admonisher. Johnson.

monishment (mōn'ish-ment), n. [monish + -ment.] Admonition. Sherwood.

monism (mōn'izm), n. [Gr. monos, single, + -ism.] 1. Any system of thought which seeks to deduce all the varied phenomena of both the physical and spiritual worlds from a single principle; specifically, the metaphysical doctrine that there is but one substance, either mind (idealism) or matter (materialism), or a substance that is neither mind nor matter, but is the substantial ground of both: opposed to dualism. The term was applied by Wolt, its inventor, to the forms of the doctrine which were then known, namely, to the denial of the substantiality either of mind or of matter; but it is now extended to the doctrine that the distinction between physical and mental facts is only phenomenal, and that in themselves they are not distinguished. Many special modifications of monistic speculation, especially on its materialistic side, have accompanied the recent developments of physical science, particularly the doctrine of evolution. (See quotation from Haeckel under monistic.) Such doctrines as that energy, electricity, etc., are categories of substance different from matter are not taken account of by those who use the term, so that it is not easy to say whether they would be considered as denials of monism or not. Also called unitism and unitarianism.

Monism led a miserable existence in philosophical dictionaries, until, as a denotation of the Hegelian philosophy, it obtained a very wide use. It had again in some measure fallen out of use when it was taken up by modern natural philosophy, and made the watchword of a doctrine which considers mind and matter neither as separated nor as derived from each other, but as standing in an essential and inseparable connection.

M. S. Phelps, Jr., of Lucken's Fundamental Concepts, p. 114.

If the essence of the materialist hypothesis be to start with matter on its lowest terms, and work it thence up into its highest, I did it no wrong in taking "homogeneous extended solids" as its specific datum and its only one, so that it constituted a system of monism.

J. Mortimer, Materialism (1874), p. 108.

2. Any theory or system which attempts to explain many heterogeneous phenomena by a single principle.

The solution offered by Psychophysical Monism, that functional brain-motion and feeling are two aspects of one and the same fact in nature . . . this solution, when closely examined, turns out to be in altogether dualistic and unthinkable assertion.

E. Montgomery, Mind, IX. 203.

3. In hull., same as monogenesis (c). — Hylosolistic monism. Same as hylosolism. — Idealistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle of the universe as mind or spirit, of which matter is the product. — Materialistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle as matter, of which mind or spirit is the product.

monist (mōn'ist), n. and a. [mon(ism) + -ist.]

1. n. An adherent of the metaphysical doctrine of monism in some one of its forms.

The philosophical unitarians or monists reject the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duality of the subject and object in perception, but they arrive at the unity of these in different ways. Some admit the testimony of consciousness as to the oneness of the mental and material phenomena, and do not attempt to reduce either mind to matter, or matter to mind. They reject, however, the evidence of consciousness to their antithesis in existence, and maintain that mind and matter are only phenomenal modifications of the same common substance. This is the doctrine of absolute identity, a doctrine of which the most illustrious representatives among recent philosophers are Schelling, Hegel, and Comte. Others again deny the evidence of consciousness to the oneness of subject and object as coordinate and original elements; and, as the balance is inclined in favor of the one relative or the other, two opposite schemes of psychology are determined. If the subject be taken as the original and genetic, and the object be evolved from it as its product, the theory of idealism is established. On the other hand, if the object be assumed as the original and genetic, and the subject be evolved from it as its product, the theory of materialism is established.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xvi.

II. a. Same as monistic.

monistic (mō-nis'tik), a. [Gr. monos, single, + -istic.] Of or pertaining to monism; of the nature of monism. See monism and monist.

Idealism is monistic in its whole conception of the universe. It claims to be a "one-substance" theory, although it should in consistency call itself a "no-substance" theory instead.

Blackburn, Seven, XLV. 108.

The opponents of the doctrine of evolution are very fond of branding the monistic philosophy grounded upon it as "materialism," by confusing philosophical materialism with the wholly different and censurable moral materialism. Strictly, however, our monism might, as accurately or as inaccurately, be called spiritualism as materialism. The real materialistic philosophy asserts that the vital phenomena of motion, like all other phenomena of motion, are effect or products of matter. The other, opposite extreme, spiritualistic philosophy, asserts, on the contrary, that matter is the product of motive force, and that all material forms are produced by free forces entirely independent of the matter itself. Thus, according to the materialistic conception of the universe, matter or substance precedes motion or active force. According to the spiritualistic conception of the universe, on the contrary, active force precedes matter. Both views are dualistic, and we hold both of them to be equally false. A contrast in both views is presented in the monistic philosophy, which can as little believe in force without matter as in matter without force.

monistral (mō-nis'tri-kal), a. Same as monistic.

monite (mō'nit), n. [Mona (see def.) + -ite.] A hydrous calcium phosphate occurring in loosely coherent massive forms of a snow-white color, found with monitite in the guano-formation of the islands of Mona and Monita, West Indies.

monition (mō-nish'ōn), n. [ME. monition, < OF. (F.) monition = Fr. monition = Sp. monición, < L. monitione, < L. monitio (n-), a. reminding, < monere, pp. monitus, remind, admonish: see monish.] 1. Admonition; warning; instruction given by way of caution: as, the monitions of a friend.

And after, by monition of the Archangell Gabryell, they made a Churell or oratory of our Lady.

Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 24.

Truly ambition is deaf, not only to the advice of friends, but to the counsels and monitions of reason itself.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. Indication; intimation.

We have no visible monition of the returns of any other periods, such as we have of the day by successive light and darkness.

Holder, On Time.

3. (a) In civil and admiralty law, a summons or citation, especially used to commence a suit, or in a proceeding to confirm a title acquired under a judicial sale and to silence all adverse claims. General monitions are used in suits in rem, where the object is to bind all the world; a special monition directs that specified persons be summoned and admonished.

They appear in the yield halls, at the day and hours limited by the said bailiffs, upon monition to them given by any seriant.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 408.

(b) In eccles. law, a formal notice, sent by a bishop to one of the subordinate clergy, to require the amendment of some ecclesiastical offense; a monitory letter. Monitions are of two classes, in specie, where the name of the offender is distinctly mentioned, and in genere, where it is not.

One who warns of faults or informs of duty; an admonisher; one who gives advice and instruction by way of reproof or caution; an admonisher.

You need not be a monitor to the king.

Daucus.

2. A senior pupil in a school appointed to instruct and look after a junior division or class; a pupil appointed to superintend other pupils; in some American colleges, a student appointed to keep a record of the attendance of the other students upon certain exercises, as morning prayers. — 3. A constable or officer of the law.

If they will pay what they owe, . . . they will save me the trouble of sending and themselves of paying a Monitor.

Advt. in Boston Gazette, September, 1767.

4. A backboard.

Posterity will ask . . .

What was a monitor in George's days.

A monitor is wood-plank shaven thin.

We want it at our backs . . .

But, these admonish'd, we can walk erect.

Cowper, Talk, II. 104.

5. [esp.] In herpet., the typical genus of Monitoridae, so called because one of the species was fabled to admonish man of the presence of the crocodile of the Nile. Also called Laramus.

6. A lizard of the genus Monitor or family Monitoridae. See cut under Hydromorpha. — 7. A heavily armored iron-clad steam-vessel with a very low free-board, of a type invented by Ericsson, carrying on deck one or more revolving turrets, each containing one or more great guns, and designed to combine the maximum of gun-power with the minimum of exposure: so called from the name of the first vessel of the type, which was built during the American civil war, and in 1862 arrested the destructive course of the Confederate iron-clad ram Merrimac.

I now submit for your approbation a name for the floating battery at Green Point. The impregnable and aggressive character of this structure will admonish the leaders of the Southern Rebellion that the batteries on the banks of their rivers will no longer present barriers to the entrance of the Union forces. The iron-clad intruder will thus prove a severe monitor to those leaders. . . . "Downing Street" will hardly view with indifference this last "Yankee notion," this monitor. . . . On these and many similar grounds I propose to name the new battery Monitor.

Ericsson, to Assist. Sec. of Navy, Jan. 20, 1862.

Cf. monastery and minster, from the same source.] 1. Originally, a man who retired from the world for religious meditation and the practice of religious duties in solitude; a religious hermit; in later use, a member of a community or fraternity of men formed for the practice of religious devotions and duties, and bound by the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; specifically, a regular male denizen of a monastery. Communities of a more or less monastic character in Palestine and Egypt before the diffusion of Christianity were the Essenes and Therapeutae (which see). The ordinary Christian life of the first three centuries, even when not celibate, was largely ascetic and in communities. Christian monasticism in a definite form originated in Upper Egypt in the third or fourth century (perhaps with St. Anthony; according to other accounts it is traced to the ascetic Paul, about A. D. 230). The first monks were anchorites, living in solitude. The collection of anchorites in a monastery (laure or cenobium) is ascribed to Pachomius, in the fourth century. The institution spread rapidly, and was greatly helped in the West by the establishment of the Benedictine order in the sixth century. Various developments of the monastic system are to be found in the middle ages, as the military orders, friars (often distinguished from monks proper), etc. Since the Reformation, and especially since the French revolution, monachism has declined in Western countries, or has been overshadowed by the society of Jesuits, but still continues to flourish in Eastern churches.

monkey (munk'ki), n. [Formerly also monkie, munkie, munkyr (not found in ME., where only ape, the general Teut. word, appears); prob., with double dim. -ky, -ie (as also later in donkey), < OF. monne = Sp. ig. mona, < It. monna, < It. mona, a female ape, a monkey (whence OIt. dim. monicchio (a form supposed by some, erroneously, to be the immediate source of the E. word; the term. -icchio, < L. -culus; also OF. monnine, monine, a monkey: see also monna, monno), appar. a particular use (as if 'old woman'), in allusion to the resemblance of a monkey's face to the weazen face of an old croup, of monna, a woman, in familiar use (like E. dame), 'goody,' 'gammer' (hence 'old woman'), a colloq. contraction of madonna, lady, mistress, lit. 'my lady,' 'madam': see madam and madonna, of which monkey is thus ult. a contracted form, with an added suffix.] 1. A quadrumanous mammal of the order Primates and sub-order Anthropoidea; a catarrhine or platyrrhine simian; any one of the Primates except man and the lemur; an ape, baboon, marmoset, etc. The term is very vague, and has no technical or fixed restriction. Those monkeys which have very short tails and faces are commonly called apes, most of them belonging to the higher family Hominidae. The monkeys with long faces like dogs are usually termed baboons; they are at the bottom of the series of Old World simians, in the family Cynopithecidae. The small bushy-tailed monkeys of America are usually known as marmosets. Excluding these, the name monkey applies mainly to long-tailed simians of either hemisphere. All the Old World monkeys, in any sense of the word, are catarrhine, and have 32 teeth, as in man. They constitute two families, Cercopithecidae and Cynopithecidae. (See cuts under Cercopithecus, Catarrhina, and Diana, 2.) All the New World monkeys are platyrrhine: there are two families, Cebidae, with 36 teeth and mostly prehensile tails, and Midae or marmosets, with 32 teeth and usually non prehensile tails. (See cuts under Cebina, Bradea, and Lagothrix.) The genera of monkeys are about 36 in number, including several that are fossil. The species are particularly numerous in Africa and South America, especially in the tropical parts. There are many, however, in the warmer parts of Asia, and even up to the snow-line; a single one is found in Europe, the Barbary ape, Macaca sylvatica. (See cut at ape.) Almost all the leading species have specific names in the vernacular as well as their technical scientific designations.

Monmouth hat. A hat worn with a Monmouth cock.

monnet (mon'et), n. See the quotation.

Little ears denote a good understanding, but they must not be of those ears which, being little, are withal deformed, which happens to men as well as cattle, which for this reason they call monnets; for such ears signify nothing but mischief and malice. Saunders, Physiognomie (1653). (Nares.)

mono (mö'nó), n. [Sp. mono, n., a monkey; cf. mona.] The black howler or howling monkey, Myiodes villosus.

mono-. [L., etc., monos, (Gr. μῆνος, stem of μῆναι, single, only; see monad.)] A prefix in many words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'single,' 'one.'

monoxal (mon-ō-ak'säl), v. [Gr. μῆνος, single, + L. axis, axis: see axial.] Pertaining to a single axis.—Monoxal isotropy, the case in which the homotatic coefficients are completely isotropic round one axis only.

monobasic (mon-ō-bä'sik), v. [Gr. μῆνος, single, + basic, base.] Having one base: applied in chemistry to an acid which enters into combination with a univalent basic radical to form a neutral salt, or a salt containing one equivalent of a base.

monoblastic (mon-ō-blas'tik), v. [Gr. μῆνος, single, + blastos, germ.] Relating to that condition of the metazoic ovum or embryo which immediately succeeds segmentation, in which a single germinal layer is alone represented: correlated with diploblastic and triploblastic.

Monoblepharides (mon-ō-blef-a-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., Monoblepharis (-id-) + -ar.] A monotypic order of oömycetous fungi, closely related to the Peronosporaceae. The thallus-hyphae bear both terminal and interstitial oogones, in which the protoplasm contracts and forms the oosphere. Propagation takes place by the formation of unilocular sporangia, as in the well-known genus Phytophthora.

Monoblepharis (mon-ō-blef'a-ris), n. [NL. (Corru), Gr. μῆνος, single, + βλέφαρος, eyelid.] A genus of fungi, typical of the order Monoblepharides.

monoblephars (mon-ō-blep'sis), n. [NL., Gr. μῆνος, single, + βλέφαρος, sight, (Gr. βλέφαρον, see, [on.] In pathol., a condition of vision in which it is more distinct when one eye only is used.

monochractus (mon-ō-brā'kī-us), n.; pl. monochracti (-ī). [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + L. brachia, the arm.] In teratol., a monster having a single arm.

monobromated (mon-ō-brō'mā-ted), a. [Gr. monos, single, + E. bromine + -ate + -ed.] Containing one bromine atom: used only of organic compounds in which one atom of bromine has been introduced into each molecule by substitution or addition.—Monobromated camphor. See camphors monobromata, under camphor.

monobromized (mon-ō-brō'mīz), a. [Gr. monos, single, + bromine + -ize + -ed.] Same as monobromated. Nature, XL, 539.

monocarbonate (mon-ō-kār'bō-nāt), n. [Gr. monos, single, + E. carbonate.] A carbonate in which both hydrogen atoms of the acid are replaced by basic elements or radicals: distinguished from bicarbonates, in which only one hydrogen atom is so replaced. More appropriately called normal carbonate.

monocarp (mon-ō-kārp), n. [Gr. monos, single, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a plant that perishes after having once borne fruit; an annual plant.

monocarpellary (mon-ō-kār'pē-lā-rī), a. [Gr. monos, single, + E. carpel + -ary.] Composed of one carpel. Compare polycarpellary.

monocarpic (mon-ō-kār'pik), a. [Gr. monocarp + -ic.] Same as monocarpous (a).

monocarpous (mon-ō-kār'pus), a. [Gr. monocarp + -ous.] In bot.: (a) Producing fruit but once in its life: said of annual plants. (b) Noting a flower in which the gynoecium forms only a single ovary, whether simple or compound.

Monocaulis (mon-ō-kā'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocaulis + -idae.] A family of tubularian hydroids or gymnoblastic Hydroids, typified by the genus Monocaulis, having a simple hydrosoma with a single fixed hydranth.

Monocaulis, Monocaulus (mon-ō-kā'li-s, -lus), n. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + καυτός, a stalk, stem; see caulis.] The typical genus of Monocaulidae. M. pendula is a simple tubular hydromedusa with a single hydranth pendulous upon the nodding or cerata stem, and bearing two cirelets of tentacles. It is of very soft, delicate structure and pink color, attaining a length of 4 inches. Also Monocaulis.

monocellular (mon-ō-sel'yū-lir), a. [Gr. monocellule + -ar.] Same as unocellular. Nature, XL, 148.

monocellule (mon-ō-sel'yū-l), n. [Gr. monos, single, + E. cellule.] A unicellular organism; an animal or a plant which consists of a single cell.

monocentric (mon-ō-sen'trik), a. [Gr. monos, single, + κέντρον, center; see centric.] 1. Having or proceeding from a single center.—2. In anat., unipolar: applied to a retina: i.e. which is not gathered again into a single trunk: opposed to ambicentric.

Monocentridae (mon-ō-sen'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocentris + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Monocentris. They have the body covered with large angular bony-like scales, the head rounded and cavernous, a spinous dorsal fin separate from the soft dorsal and composed of 5 large spines divergated and not completely connected by membrane, and the ventrals represented only by very large spines. There is but one species, Monocentris japonicus of the Japanese seas.

Monocentris (mon-ō-sen'tris), n. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + κέντρον, point, center; see center.] The typical genus of Monocentridae, characterized by the great development of the ventral spines. Block and Schneider, 1801. Also Monocentrus.

monocephalus (mon-ō-sel'g-lus), a. [Gr. NL. monocephalus, < Gr. monos, single, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. Having only one head; in bot., bearing a single capitulum or head.—2. Specifically, having the character of a monocephalus.

monocephalus (mon-ō-sel'g-lus), n.; pl. monocephali (-ī). [NL.: see monocephalus.] In teratol., a double monster having only one head but two bodies. Also called syncephalus.

monoceros (mon-ō-sēr'kus), a. [Gr. monos, single, + κέρας, the tail of a beast; see cercus.] Having only one "tail," or flagellum; uniaugellate, as an infusorian.

monoceros (mō-nōs'ē-rōs), n. [L. monoceros, < Gr. monos, single, + κέρας, a unicorn, also μονοκέρας, one-horned, < monos, single, + κέρας, horn.] 1. A unicorn, or some other one-horned animal, real or imaginary.

Mighty Hesperus with measured tapers.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xl. 21.

2. [esp.] A constellation, the Unicorn, south of the Twins and the Crab, and between the two Dogs, introduced by Jacob Bartsch in 1624.—3. The narwhal, Monodon monoceros.—4. [esp.] In zool.: (a) A genus of prosobranchiates of the family Muricidae, so called from the large spine on the outer lip; the unicorn-shells. There are several species from the west coast of America. Lamarck, 1800. (b) A genus of ballistoid fishes. Block and Schneider, 1801.

monoceros (mō-nōs'ē-rus), a. [Gr. monos, single, + κέρας, one-horned; see monoceros.] Having one horn or horn-like part; unicorn.

monochasial (mon-ō-kā'si-al), a. [Gr. monochasium + -al.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling a monochasium.

monochasium (mon-ō-kā'si-um), n.; pl. monochasia (-ī). [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + χασίς, separation, chasm, < χάωμι, gape; see chasm.] In bot., a cyme with one main axis; a uniparous cyme: a term proposed by Eichler.

Monochitonida (mon'ō-kī-ton'ī-dā), n. pl. [NL. (cf. Gr. monochiton, wearing only a tunic), < Gr. monos, single, + χίτων, a tunic (see chiton), + -ida.] A division of tunicates or Tunicata, containing those which have the inner and outer integuments united in a single tunic, such as the Salpidae and Doliolidae: opposed to Dichitonida. Fleming, 1828.

monochitonidan (mon'ō-kī-ton'ī-dan), a. and n. 1. A having a single tunic; specifically, pertaining to the Monochitonida, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Monochitonida, as a salp or doliolid.

Monochlamydes (mon'ō-kī-mid'ē-dē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1819), fem. pl. of monochlamydeus; see monochlamydeus.] A division of dicotyledonous plants, characterized by apetalous flowers—that is, flowers with a perianth of a single row of envelopes—and so distinguished from the divisions Polypetalae and Gymnopetalae, which have two rows, or both calyx and corolla; the Apetalae. It includes 30 orders, among them the amaranth, chamæd, hackweat, pepper, laurel, euphorbia, nettle, walnut, oak, and willow families.

monochlamydeous (mon'ō-kī-mid'ē-us), a. [Gr. NL. monochlamydeus, < Gr. monos, single, + χλαμύς (χλαμύς), a cloak; see chlamys.] In bot., having a single instead of a double perianth: applied to flowers. The missing set is considered to be the inner, or corolla. Compare ochlamydeous and dichlamydeous. See Monochlamydes.

monochord (mon'ō-kōrd), n. [= F. monochord]. monochord = Sp. Pg. monochorda = It. monochorda, < L. monochordus, monochordon, < Gr. monochordos, a monochord, neut. of μονοχρῶς, with a single string, < monos, single, + χρῶς, string.] An acoustical instrument, invented at a very early date in Egypt or Greece, consisting of a long resonance-box over which a single string of gut or wire is stretched, the vibrating length, and thus the pitch, of which is fixed by a movable bridge. The position of the bridge required to produce particular intervals may be mathematically determined, and marked on the body of the instrument. The monochord has been much used in acoustical demonstration and in teaching pure intonation. In the middle ages smaller instruments with several strings were made, and were often permanently tuned to give certain intervals (see hedion (a)). The notion of a primitive keyboard instrument doubtless sprang from some such beginning.

monochromatic (mon'ō-kōrd-mat'ik), a. [= F. monochromatique = Pg. monochromatico, < Gr. μονοχρωματικός, of one color, < monos, single, + χρῶμα (-τος), color; see chromatic.] Consisting of light of one wave-length, and in that sense of one color only, as the light produced by a Bunsen flame in which sodium is being volatilized. The light of the flame is almost entirely that due to the two sodium lines, the colors of which are barely distinguishable from one another, and the consequence is that objects viewed by this light are all yellow, and differ only in form and illumination. A monochromatic light gives a single bright line when viewed with the spectro-scope.

monochrome (mon'ō-krōm), n. [= F. monochrome = Pg. monochroma, < ML. monochroma, Monoceros americana.

fem. of L. monochroma, < Gr. μονοχρῶμα, also μονοχρωματικός, of one color (see monochromatic), < monos, single, + χρῶμα, color.] Painting or a painting in one color, which may, however, be relieved by the use of lighter and darker shades. Compare chromatic and grisaille.

monochromical (mon-ō-krō'mī-kāl), a. [As monochrom(a)tic + -al.] Of a single color; one-colored.

monochromy (mon'ō-krō-mī), n. [As monochrome + -y.] The art or practice of painting in monochrome, or in one or more shades of a single color.

Monochromy is advantageously employed when it is desired, on the one hand, to avoid the brilliancy attendant on the introduction of several distinct colours, and, on the other, the dullness consequent on the exclusive use of a single tone. O. N. Reed, Modern Chromatics, p. 210.

monochronic (mon-ō-kron'ik), a. [L. monochronos, of the same time or measure, < Gr. μονοχρονος, of the same time or measure, consisting of one time or measure, temporary, < monos, single, + χρῶνος, time.] Of one and the same time; existing or happening at the same time; contemporaneous; in geol., deposited, or apparently deposited, at the same period; said of organic remains.

monochronous (mō-nōk'rō-nus), a. [Gr. μονοχρονος, of the same time or measure; see monochronic.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to one time or more; monosyllabic.

monociliated (mon-ō-sil'ē-ted), a. [Gr. monos, single, + NL. cilium + -ate + -ed.] Having one cilium or flagellum; uniciliate or uniaugellate.

monocle (mon'ō-kī), n. [= OF. monocle, one-eyed, F. monocle, a single eye-glass, < L. monoculus, one-eyed; see monoculus.] 1. A monoculous or one-eyed animal; a monocle.—2. A glass for one eye; a single eye-glass.

Another [man], with a monocle in his eye, watched each new comet, his vacant and necessarily glassy stare expressing neither present pleasure nor anticipation. The Century, XXXIII. 308.

Monoclea (mon-ō-kī-ā), n. [NL. (W. J. Hooker, 1820), so called because the sporangia open only on one side; < Gr. monos, single, + κλέα, a key.] A monotypic genus of cryptogamous plants of the class Hepaticae, giving name to the order Monocleaceae. They are small plants with frondose thallus, and have much the appearance of Marchantia.

Monocleaceae (mon'ō-kī-ā-kē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1833-8), < Monoclea + -aceae.] A small order of cryptogamous plants of the class Hepaticae, intermediate in position between the Jugermanniaceae and the Anthocerotaceae. The vegetative structure is either thalloid or foliose, the sporangium dehiscens longitudinally, and contains elaters, but has no columella. The order contains the genera Coleophora and Monoclea.

monoclinial (mon'ō-kī-nī-āl), a. and n. [Gr. μονοκλίνας + -al.] 1. a. In geol., dipping in one direction: said of a zone of stratified rocks throughout which the strata all incline toward the same point of the compass. The term was introduced by H. D. Rogers (1842), and has taken the place of Barrow's hybrid word unifacial, thus, monoclinial valley (a valley bounded by ridges the strata of which all dip in the same direction), monoclinial ridge, monoclinial flexure, etc. A monoclinial flexure may be regarded as a half of an anticlinal fold, which would have been completed had the flexing action not been limited to one side of the axis, the strata resembling their horizontality on the other side.

The Echo Cliff flexure, the Water-Pocket flexure, one of the grandest monoclinals of the west, and the San Rafael flexure, all monoclinial flexures of imposing dimensions and perfect form, Capt. Button considers go far back in Tertiary time, and possibly are pre-Tertiary. Reade, Origin of Mountain Ranges, p. 250.

II. n. A monoclinial fold or flexure. See I. monoclinite (mon'ō-kī-nī-tē), a. [Gr. monos, single, + κλίσις, incline, + -ite.] Same as monocline.

monocline (mon'ō-kī-nī), n. [Gr. monos, single, + κλίσις, incline; see cline.] Same as monoclinial.

monoclinic (mon-ō-kī-nīk), a. [= F. monoclinique; < Gr. monos, single, + κλίσις, incline.] In mineral., an epithet noting that system of crystallization in which the crystals are referred to three unequal axes, two of which intersect each other at an oblique angle, while they are at right angles to the third. See crystallography. Also monosymmetric, clinorhombic, hemitrochite, monoclinometric, and monoclinohedric.

monoclinohedric (mon-ō-kī-nī-kēd'rik), a. [Gr. monos, single, + κλίσις, incline, + ἵδρα, sent, base.] Same as monoclinic.

monoclinometric (mon-ō-kli-nō-met'rik), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κλίσις, incline, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as monoclinic; as, "monoclinometric prism." Frég.

monoclinous (mon-ō-kli-nūs), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κλίσις, incline, + κλίσις, incline: see clime.] 1. In bot., hermaphrodite, or having both stamens and pistils in the same flower. — 2. In zool., monoclinial.

Monocelia (mon-ō-sē-li-ā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κεῖρα, a cavity, hollow: see celia.] Animals whose cephalocoele is single, neuron apical only, and axon unsegmented. The lancelet (Branchiostoma) is the only example. Synonyms with Acanthia, Cephalochorda, Leptocaulis, and Monocaularia. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

monocellian (mon-ō-sē-li-ān), a. [Gr. Monocelia + -ian.] Having the cephalocoele single; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monocelia.
mono-compound (mon-ō-kōm'pound), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + Ε. compound.] In chem., a compound containing one atom of the element or one individual of the radical specified, as monochloroacetic acid, which contains one atom of chlorine, and monophenylamine, which contains one molecule of phenyl.

Monocodyla (mon-ō-kōn-di-lā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κώδυλα, a knuckle, joint, knob: see condyle.] The Reptilia and Aves (reptiles and birds) collectively; so called from the single occipital condyle characteristic of these classes among the higher vertebrates. The term indicates a group exactly coterminous with Sauropsida. Opposed to Amphicoodyla.

monocondylar (mon-ō-kōn-di-lār), a. Same as monocondylous.

monocondylarian (mon-ō-kōn-di-lār-i-ān), a. [As Monocodyla + -ian.] Having one occipital condyle, as the skull of birds, reptiles, and some fishes; distinguished from dicondylarian.

monocotyledon (mon-ō-kōt-i-lē-dōn), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κότυλη, a hollow, a sucker, etc.: see cotyledon.] A monocotyledonous plant; an endogen. See endogen, and cut under cotyledon.

Monocotyledones (mon-ō-kōt-i-lē-dōn-ēz), n. pl. [N.L. (Ray, 1703), Gr. μῶνος, single, + κότυλη, a cup-shaped cavity: see cotyledon.] A natural class of flowering plants, having a single seed-leaf or cotyledon in the embryo. They have generally the parts of their flowers in threes (not in fives, as in dicotyledons), their earliest leaves alternate, and the veins parallel. From the structure of the stem, increasing by internal or endogenous growth, they are also called endogens. The wood of their stems occurs in longitudinal bundles of fibers, scattered, as in Indian corn, or becoming compact, as in palms. New bundles of fibers form between the old, not, as in dicotyledons or exogens, in an annual external layer enveloping the stem. The class is divided into 34 orders, among which are the lily, iris, amaryllis, orchid, banana, etc., pineapple, screw-pine, arum, rush, etc., and grass families. By Bentham and Hooker these are classed in seven groups or series; by others in three, the apetalous, petaloidous, and glumaceous divisions. About 30,000 species are known, included in about 1,500 genera.

monocotyledonous (mon-ō-kōt-i-lē-dōn-ūs), a. [Gr. monocotyledon + -ous.] In bot., having only one seed-leaf or seminal leaf.

monocracy (mō-nōk'ra-si), n.; pl. monocracies (-iz). [L.Gr. μοναρχία, sole dominion, Gr. μῶνος, single, + αρχή, rule, Gr. κράτος, strength.] Government or rule by a single person; autocracy.

A scene of wholesale bacchanalian fraud, a posse comitatus of huns, which would disgrace any man with a free government, and make him sigh for the democracy of Constantinople. Sydney Smith, Ralston. (Latham) monocrat (mon-ō-krat), n. [Y. M.Gr. μοναρχος, a sole ruler; Gr. μῶνος, single, + αρχή, rule, Gr. κράτος, strength.] 1. One who governs alone; an autocrat. — 2. In U. S. hist., a name often applied by opponents to a member of the Federalist party, to which monarchical tendencies were imputed.

monocular (mō-nōk'ū-lār), a. [= F. monoculaire, L.L. monoculus, one-eyed: see monocu- lous.] 1. Having only one eye. Also monoculatus. — 2. Of or referring to one eye or vision with one eye; suited or intended for the use of one eye only. — Monocular microscope. See microscope.

monocularly (mō-nōk'ū-lār-lī), adv. By means of one eye; so as to be seen by one eye only.

No one who has only thus worked monocularly can appreciate the guidance derivable from binocular vision. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 36.

monoculate (mō-nōk'ū-lāt), a. [As monoculus + -ate.] Same as monocular, 1.

monocule (mon-ō-kūl), n. [N.L. Monoculus.] A member of the genus Monoculus.

monoculite (mō-nōk'ū-līt), n. [L.L. monoculus, one-eyed (see monoculous) + -ite.] A fossil animal that appears to have but one eye.

monoculous (mō-nōk'ū-lūs), a. [= OF. monocle, monocule = Sp. monoculo = It. monocolo, L.L. monoculus, one-eyed, Gr. μῶνος, single, + L. oculus, eye: see oculus.] Gr. monocle.] One-eyed; monocular.

Dr. Knox was the monoculous Waterloo surgeon, with whom I remember breakfasting. O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LIX, 638.

Monoculus (mō-nōk'ū-lūs), n. [N.L., L.L. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. An old and disused genus of the Linnean class Insecta and order Aptera, having or seeming to have only one eye — that is, two eyes coalesced in one. These "apterous insects" were entomostrophic crustaceans. Monoculus and some other entomostrophic were afterward made by Latreille his first order of Entomostropha, called Branchiopoda and divided into two principal sections, Lophopoda and Phyllopoda. 2. [L. c.] A one-eyed animal; a monocule or monocle. — 3. [L. c.] A bandage for one eye.

monocycle (mō-nōk'ū-sīk), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle, a wheel: see cycle.] A vehicle with one wheel: used figuratively in the quotation. [Rare.]

Any, a not unfrequent "penance" consists in tying the hands to the ankles, and turning round and round like a cart-wheel. Near Gortickpoor the train of Lord Dalhousie met dozens of these animated monocycles. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII, 203.

Monocycella (mō-nōk'ū-sīk'ē-lā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle: see cycle.] A division of holothurians containing those in which the tentacles are in one circle or series: correlated with Heterocycella.

monocyclic (mō-nōk'ū-sīk'ē-līk), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle: see cycle.] 1. Disposed in a single whorl or circular series, as the stamens in many flowers. — 2. Of or pertaining to the Monocycella.

monocyst (mon-ō-sist), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] A tumor consisting of only one cyst. Thomas, Med. Diet.

Monocystaceæ (mon-ō-sis-tā-sē-ā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύστις, a bladder, + -aceæ.] A family of fungi of the order Monadineæ. They are moisture-loving plants, occurring on living Algae and Protococci, with the organs of reproduction reduced to the form of sporocysts. The family contains 3 genera.

monocysted (mon-ō-sis-tēd), a. [As monocyst + -ed.] Having a single cyst; monocystidean.

The developmental history of the monocysted gregarines. H. Hill, Smithsonian Report, 1888.

monocystic (mon-ō-sis'tik), a. [Gr. monocyst + -ic.] Consisting of a single cyst, as a gregarine. Engey, Brit., XIX, 833.

Monocystidea (mon-ō-sis-tīd'ē-ā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. Monocystis + -idea.] A division of Gregarinida, containing those gregarines whose body consists of a single sac: contrasted with Dicystidea. Also Monocystidae, as a family.

monocystidean (mō-nō-sis-tīd'ē-ān), a. Monocysted; of or pertaining to the Monocystidea.

Monocystis (mon-ō-sis'tis), n. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] The typical genus of Monocystidea. M. apicis is found in the male organ of the earthworm.

Monocystaria (mō-nōk'ū-sī-tār-i-ā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + κύστις, dim. of κύστις, a hollow, a cell, Gr. κύστις, a hollow.] A division of Radiolaria, containing those radiolarians which have a single central capsule: distinguished from Polycystaria. Most radiolarians are of this character. Also called Monozoa.

monocystarian (mō-nōk'ū-sī-tār-i-ān), a. and n. [As Monocystaria + -an.] 1. A having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian; of or pertaining to the Monocystaria. Also monozoon.

II. a. A radiolarian whose central capsule is single.

monodactyl, monodactyle (mon-ō-dak'til), a. Same as monodactylous. Nature, XXXVIII, 633.

monodactylic (mon-ō-dak'til'ik), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger, a dactyl: see dactylic.] In anc. pros., containing but one dactyl; noting certain logaoedic meters. See monanapestic.

monodactylous (mon-ō-dak'ti-lūs), a. [= F. monodactyle = Pg. monodactilo, Gr. μονοδάκτυλος, one-fingered, Gr. μῶνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger or toe: see dactyl.] 1. Having but one finger or toe; unidigitate. — 2. In Crustacea, subchelate: applied to the subcheliform limbs of crustaceans and arachnids, in which there is no opposable finger to convert the terminal hook into a pincer-like claw or chela proper.

monodelph (mon-ō-delf), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + δελφίς, womb.] A monodelphian mammal.

Monodelphia (mon-ō-del'fi-ā), n. pl. [N.L., Gr. μῶνος, single, + δελφίς, womb.] The highest of three primary divisions of mammals, or subclasses of the class Mammalia (the other two being Didelphia and Ornithodelphia); placental mammals, or Placentalia. The subclass contains all mammals except the marsupials and monotremes. The young are retained in the womb by means of placental attachment till they are well developed; the scrotum is never in front of the penis; and the uterus and vagina are never paired. The brain has a well-developed corpus callosum, and comparatively small anterior commissure. The Monodelphia are variously divided into an upper and a lower series, Eutheria or Euarchontes and Insectivora or Micrometaria; or into Archentophala (man alone), Gynanthophala, and Microphala; or directly into a number of orders. The orders of living monodelphians now usually adopted are eleven: Primates, Fera, Ungulata, Ruminantia, Proboscidea, Sirenia, and Cete, of the upper series; and Chiroptera, Insectivora, Glires (or Rodentia), and Bruia (or Edentata), of the lower series. The families are about 120 in number. Eutheria is a synonym. Also, wrongly, Mamalia.

monodelphian (mon-ō-del'fi-ān), a. and n. [Gr. Monodelphia + -an.] 1. a. Having the female generative passages single; specifically, pertaining to the Monodelphia, or having their characters.

II. n. A monodelphian mammal.

monodelphic (mon-ō-del'fik), a. [Gr. monodelph + -ic.] Same as monodelphian.

monodelphous (mon-ō-del'fus), a. Same as monodelphian.

monodia (mō-nō'di-ā), n. Same as monody.

monodic (mō-nōd'ik), a. [= It. monodico, Gr. μονόδικος, Gr. μῶνος, a monody: see monody.] In music, pertaining to monody or homophony; homophonic. Also monophonic. — Monodic school or style, that style of composition which supplanted the purely polyphonic or contrapuntal about 1600.

monodical (mō-nōd'ik-āl), a. [Gr. monodic + -al.] Same as monodic.

monodically (mō-nōd'ik-āl-lī), adv. In a monodic manner.

monodichlamydeous (mon-ō-dī-kla-mīd'ē-ūs), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + δι-, two, + χλῆμα (χλῆμα), a cloak.] In bot., having indifferently either a calyx only, or both calyx and corolla. Lindley. [Not now in use.]

monodimetric (mon-ō-dī-met'rik), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + δι-, twice, + μέτρον, measure: see dimetric.] In crystal., same as dimetric or tetragonal.

monodist (mon-ō-dīst), n. [= Pg. monodista; as monod-y + -ist.] One who composes or sings in a monodic style, as opposed to the polyphonic style: opposed to contrapuntist.

Monodon (mon-ō-dōn), n. [N.L., Gr. μονόδοντος (μονόδοντος), having but one tooth: see monodont.] 1. A genus of delphinoid odontocete cetaceans, containing only the narwhal, M. monaceros, distinguished by its unique dentition. With the exception of some rudimentary and irregular teeth, the whole dentition consists of a pair of teeth lying horizontally in the jaw: in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk, like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved anteriorly, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 30 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

Skull and Tusk of Male Narwhal (Monodon monaceros).

2. In coach., same as Monodonta. Carter, 1817.

monodont (mon-ō-dont), a. [Gr. μονόδοντος (μονόδοντος), having but one tooth, Gr. μῶνος, single, + δόντις = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-dont'ā), n. [N.L., Gr. μονόδοντος (μονόδοντος), having but one tooth, see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidae, having a toothed columella: named by Lamarck in 1799. There are a number of species, known as rosary-shells.

Monodontinae (mon-ō-don-tī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Monodon (t-) + -ina.] The narwhals as a subfamily of Delphinidae; now usually merged in the subfamily Delphinapterinae.

Monodora (mon-ō-dō-rā), n. [NL. (Dunal, 1817), so called in allusion to the solitary flowers; < Gr. monos, single, + dōra, gift.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the order Myrtales and the tribe Mitrophoreae, distinguished by a one-celled compound ovary with numerous seeds attached over the whole surface of the walls. They are trees with large solitary variegated flowers, hanging upon a long stalk which terminates the stem or is opposite the leaves. They have three sepals, six wavy petals, many short stamens, and a shield-shaped stigma; their large globose woody fruit contains numerous seeds in a resinous central pulp. There are 3 species, natives of central Africa, of which M. Myrtilles, the calabash-nutmeg, furnishes in its seeds a nutmeg-like spice. It is cultivated in Jamaica, etc., and hence called American, Jamaican, and Mexican nutmeg. M. Angolensis yields a similar product.

monodrama (mon-ō-dra-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + drama, a drama.] A dramatic piece for a single performer or actor; sometimes used also for a piece for two performers.

monodramatic (mon-ō-dra-mat'ik), a. [< monodrama + -atic.] Pertaining to a monodrama.

monodrame, n. [< monodrama.] Same as monodrama.

monodromic (mon-ō-drom'ik), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + dromos, a course, running, race.] In math., having a single sheet in the Riemann's surface; not having different values for one value of the variable. A monodromic function is one having the property that if, by a continuous change, the variable makes an excursion and returns to its original value, the function will also return to its original value. Also monotropic.

monody (mon-ō-di), n.; pl. monodies (-liz). [Also monadit; = F. monodie = Sp. monodia = Pg. It. monaditi, < ML. monodia, < LL. monodia, monaditum, < Gr. monodia, a solo, lament, < monos, single, + ōdi, a song, ode; see ode.] 1. In music: (a) A style of composition in which one voice-part decidedly preponderates in interest over the others; homophony; opposed to polyphony, in which all the voice-parts are equally important. The term is especially applied to the modern style which arose somewhat before 1600 in Italy, and which led rapidly to the invention and great popularity of the opera, the oratorio, and the instrumental suite. The style itself had long before been known in popular songs and dances, but only then asserted itself as a controlling power in artistic music. (b) A piece written in monodic style; a melody, tune, or air, usually for the voice. (c) A composition written in one part only; a solo. Also monophony.

Funeral songs were called . . . Monodia if they were uttered by one alone, and this was used at the entombment of princes and others of great account, and it was reckoned a great civility to use such ceremonies.

Pullenham, Art of Eng. Poets, p. 30.

2. Monotonous sound; monotonousness of sound.

Hear the tolling of the bells—
Iron bells!

What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
Poe, The Bells, iv.

monodynamic (mon-ō-di-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + dynamis, power; see dynamic.] Having but one power, capacity, or talent. [Rare.]

Monodynamic men, men of a single talent, are rarely misapprehended.
De Quincey.

Monocla (mō-nē-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + clax, house.] In De Blainville's classification (1825), the second of three sub-classes of his Paracanthophora, contrasted with Dioica and Hermaphrodita, named in the form Monocla.

Monocla (mō-nē-shi-j), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + clax, house.] The twenty-first class of plants in the artificial system of Linnaeus. In this class the stamens and pistils are in separate flowers on the same plant, as in the Arceuthobium.

monoclan, monoclan (mō-nē-shi-an), a. and n. [< monoclaus + -an.] 1. a. Same as monoclaus.

2. n. A monocious animal.

monocious, monocious (mō-nē-shus), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + clax, house.] 1. In bot.: (a) In phanerogams, having the stamens and pistils in different flowers on the same plant. (b) In cryptogams, having both male and female organs on the same individual. 2. In zool., having both male and female sexual organs; hermaphrodite; androgynous; applied according to the corresponding usage in botany; opposed to dioecious. In numerous lower invertebrates the male and female products of generation, or ova and spermatozoa, mature in the same individual without sexual intercourse. In many other cases, as those of worms and snails, every individual is both male and female, but there is sexual intercourse and reciprocal impregnation between two individuals.

monociously, monociously (mō-nē-shus-li), adv. In a monocious manner; with a tendency to monocisism. Monociously polygamous, in bot. See polygamous.

monocism, monicism (mō-nē-sizm), n. [< monocis (ious) + -ism.] The state or quality of being monocious; hermaphroditism; androgynicity.

monoembryony (mon-ō-em-bri-on-i), n. [< Gr. monos, single, + embryon, embryo; see embryo.] In bot., the condition of possessing only a single embryo, as the seeds of most angiosperms.

monoflagellate (mon-ō-flaj'e-lat), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + E. flagellate, a.] Monomastigote or uniflagellate, as an infusorian.

monogam (mon-ō-gam), n. [< LL. monogamus, < LGr. monogamos, married but once; see monogamous.] In bot., a plant that has solitary flowers with the anthers united.

Monogamia (mon-ō-gā-mi-j), n. pl. [NL., < LGr. monogamos, married but once; see monogamous.] In bot., one of the six orders of the nineteenth class, the Syngenesia, in the Linnæan system, in which the flowers are solitary and have united anthers.

monogamian (mon-ō-gā-mi-an), a. Same as monogamious.

monogamic (mon-ō-gam'ik), a. [< MGr. monogamikos, < monogamos, one married but once; see monogamous.] Same as monogamous. II. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 227.

monogamist (mō-nog-a-mist), n. [< monogamy + -ist.] 1. One who has been married only once; one who believes that a person should not marry oftener than once—that is, that a widower or widow should not remarry.

I maintained . . . that it was unlawful for a priest of the Church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second, or, to express it in one word, I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist.
Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

2. One who has but one (living and undivorced) wife, as opposed to a bigamist or a polygamist.

monogamistic (mon-ō-ga-mis'tik), a. [< monogamist + -ic.] Same as monogamous.

monogamous (mō-nog-a-mus), a. [< F. monogame = Sp. monogamo = Pg. It. monogamo, < LL. monogamus, < LGr. monogamos, married but once, < Gr. monos, single, + gamos, marriage.] 1. Practising or supporting the principle of monogamy. (a) Marrying only once—that is, not remarrying after the death of the spouse; opposed to bigamous or polygamous. (b) Marrying only one at a time; opposed to bigamous or polygamous.

2. Of or pertaining to monogamy; as, monogamous doctrines or customs. 3. In zool., having only one mate; living in pairs; as, a monogamous family of birds. 4. In bot., having solitary flowers with united anthers, as in Lobelia.—Doubtly monogamous, in ornith., said of birds the male of which takes part in nest-building, incubation, and care of the young, as pigeons and many other birds.

monogamy (mō-nog-a-mi), n. [= F. monogamie = Sp. monogamia = Pg. It. monogamia, < LL. monogamia, < LGr. monogamia, single marriage, < monogamos, married but once; see monogamous.] 1. The practice of marrying only once, or the principle which upholds that practice; the principle that forbids remarriage after the death of a former husband or wife; opposed to bigamy. See bigamy, 2.—2. The condition of being married to only one person at one time; opposed to bigamy or polygamy. See bigamy, 1.

The monogamy of the modern and western world is, in fact, the monogamy of the Romans, from which the license of divorce has been expelled by Christian morality.

Noise, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 60.

3. In zool., the habit of having only one mate; the habit of living in pairs; the paired state.—Double monogamy, in ornith., the state or habit of being doubly monogamous. See phrase under monogamous. monoganglionic (mon-ō-gang-gli-on'ik), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + E. ganglion + -ic.] Having a single ganglion.

monogastric (mon-ō-gas'trik), a. [= F. monogastrique, < Gr. monos, single, + gaster, stomach; see gaster, gastric.] Having only one stomach or digestive cavity.—Monogastric Diphyidae or Diphyda. See the quotation under diphyidae.

Monogenea (mon-ō-jē-nē-jā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. monogenēs, only-begotten, single; see monogenesis.] A division of fluke-worms or trematodes, containing those which undergo scarcely any change or comparatively little transformation in development; opposed to Ligenea. There are several families and numerous genera.

monogeneous (mon-ō-jē-nē-jā), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + gēnes, kind.] 1. In biol., generated in the same form as that of the parents; homogeneous as regards stages of development; specifically said of the Monogenea.—2. In math., having a single differential coefficient.

monogenesis (mon-ō-jē-nē-jā), n. [NL., < Gr. monos, single, + gēnes, origin; see genesis.] In biol.: (a) Development of the ovum from a parent similar to itself; opposed to metagenesis. E. van Beneden. (b) Generation of an individual from one parent which develops both male and female products, or ova and spermatozoa. A. Thomson. (c) Descent of all living things from a single cell. Haeckel.

monogenesy (mon-ō-jē-nē-jā), n. [As monogenesis.] Same as monogenism or monogeny. Encyc. Diet.

monogenetic (mon-ō-jē-nē-jā), a. [< monogenesis, after genetic.] 1. Of or pertaining to monogenesis.—2. Of or relating to monogenism.

The monogenetic theory, which believes in the original common origin of all mankind from one pair.
Science, VII, 102.

3. In geol., being the result of one genetic process; applied by Dana to mountain-ranges.

The Appalachians, a range of many mountain ridges and valleys, constitute one individual among mountains, because a result of one genetic process, or, in a word, monogenetic.
Dana, Man. of Geol. (3d ed.), p. 706.

monogenism (mō-noj'e-nizm), n. [< monogeny + -ism.] The descent of the whole human race from a single pair. Also called monogeny. Adamic monogenism, the descent of the human race from Adam and Eve, according to the Moslem account. Huxley, Criticism and Address, p. 102.

monogenist (mō-noj'e-nist), n. and a. [< monogeny + -ist.] 1. n. 1. One who maintains the doctrine of monogenism in any form.

To meet the inevitable question of "Whence the first organic matter?" the Monogenist is reduced to enumerate the existing elements into which the simplest living jelly or sarcoid is resolvable. Owen, Anat. (1850), II, 817.

2. One who believes in the doctrine of monogenism.

According to the Monogenists, all mankind have sprung from a single pair, whose multitudinous progeny spread themselves over the world.

Huxley, Criticism and Address, p. 102.

II. a. Of or pertaining to monogenesis or monogenism; as, a monogenist theory.

monogenistic (mō-nō-jē-nis'tik), a. [< monogenist + -ic.] Same as monogenist.

monogenous (mō-noj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. monos, single, + gēnes, produce; see genesis.] 1. Generated or generating by means of fission, germination, or sporulation, as modes of asexual reproduction.

Reproduction by fission, which, with that by budding and spore-formation, is included under the term monogenous asexual reproduction.
Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 60.

2. Of or pertaining to monogenism.—3. In math., having a single differential coefficient considered as a rule of generation.—Monogenous function, a function $x + y$, of the imaginary variable $x + yi$, such that monogeny (mō-noj'e-ni), n. [< Gr. monos, single, + gēnes, produce; see geny.] 1.

$$\frac{\partial x}{\partial z} = \frac{\partial y}{\partial z} \text{ and } \frac{\partial x}{\partial \bar{z}} = -\frac{\partial y}{\partial \bar{z}}.$$

It is usually defined as a function having a differential coefficient.

Same as monogeny, 1, or monogenesis.—2. Same as monogenism.

monoglot (mon'ō-glōt), n. [Gr. μονόγλωττος, monoglossos, speaking but one language, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γλῶττα, Attic form of γλῶσσα, tongue, language.] 1. Speaking or using only one language.—2. Written or published in only one language.

monogenic (mon'ō-gō-nē'ik), a. [From monogeny + -ic.] Of or pertaining to monogeny: same as monogenous, 1.

Monogonopora (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rā), n. pl. [N.L., neut. pl. of monogonoporus: see monogonoporous.] A division of dendrocoelous turbellarian worms, having the sexual opening single, whence the name. It contains the land and fresh-water planarians of the families Planariidae and Geoplariidae. Opposed to Digonopora.

monogonoporic (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rik), a. [From monogonoporus + -ic.] Having a single sexual opening or generative pore; specifically, pertaining to the Monogonopora; or having their characters.

monogonoporous (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rus), a. [From monogonoporus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γόνος, generation, + πόρος, passage.] Having a single genital pore, as a turbellarian; pertaining to the Monogonopora; opposed to digonoporous.

monogony (mon'ō-gō-nē), n. [From μόνος, single, + γονεῖν, produce: see -gony.] 1. Asexual reproduction; agamogony: used by Haeckel in distinction from amphigony. Monogony is exhibited in the lowest animals, in which there is no sex, as in cases of reproduction by fission or gemmation without conjugation. The term is not applied to sexual modes of reproduction, as parthenogenesis, which occur in sexual animals. Also monogeny, monogenesy. 2. Same as monogenesis.

monogram (mon'ō-grām), n. [= F. monogramme; Sp. monograma; It. monogramma, < L.L. monogramma, < Gr. μονογράμματος (not monographe), a character consisting of several letters in one, neut. of μονογράμματος, consisting of one letter (μονόγραμμα, drawn with single lines, outlined, > L. monogramma, an outline sketch, skeleton, shadow), < μόνος, single, + γράμμα(-r), letter: see gram.] 1. One character in writing; a mark or design formed or consisting of one letter.

If in compass of no art it [my supercilious] came To be described by a monogram.

R. Johnson, Discoveries, lxx.

2. Two or more of the letters of a name or word, or of the initials of several names or words, so combined as to form or appear to form a single character.

That the founder was a Bishop Euphrasius is shown by his monogram on many of the altars.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 101.

3t. A picture drawn in lines without color; a sketch.

A kind of first draught or ground colours only, and monogram of life. Hammond, Works, IV, 571. (Latham.)

monogram-machine (mon'ō-grām-mā-shēn'), n. A foot-press used to stamp monograms, initials, etc., on paper and the like.

monogrammatic (mon'ō-grām-mat'ik), a. [From monogram (L.L. monogramma) + -at.] Same as monogrammatic. [Rare.]

monogrammatic (mon'ō-grām-mat'ik), a. [= F. monogrammatique, < L.L. monogramma(-t), monogram: see monogram.] In the style or manner of a monogram; pertaining to monograms.

One photo-lithographed plate of monogrammatic emblems, the meaning of which remains unknown.

The Academy, April 6, 1880, p. 518.

monogrammic (mon'ō-grām-mik), a. [= F. monogrammique; as monogram (L.L. monogramma) + -ic.] Same as monogrammatic.

monograph (mon'ō-grāf), n. [= F. monographie; as monographo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γράφω, writing.] An account or description of a single thing or class of things; a treatise on a single subject or a single department, division, or detail of a branch of study.

A monograph on the ant, as treated by Solomon, showing the harmony of the Book of Proverbs with the results of modern research. George Allen, Middlemarch, xvi.

monograph (mon'ō-grāf), v. t. [From monograph, n.] To write or produce a monograph on; treat in a monograph.

The British species of Umbellales have never been carefully monographed.

Darwin, Formation of Vegetable Mould, p. 8.

monographer (mō-nō-grā-fēr), n. A writer of monographs.

monographic (mon'ō-grāf'ik), a. [= F. monographique; as monographo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γράφω, writing.] 1. Of or pertaining to a monograph; of the nature of a monograph.

It does not pretend to monographic completeness, which would require far more profound and exhaustive studies. Science, VII, 95.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a monogram.

A monographic combination of the letters A and P. Harper's Mag., LXXVI, 742.

3. Drawn in lines without colors.

monographical (mon'ō-grāf'ik-al), a. [From monographic + -al.] Same as monographic.

monographically (mon'ō-grāf'ik-al-i), adv. In the manner or form of a monograph.

monographist (mō-nō-grāf'ist), n. [From monograph + -ist.] One who writes a monograph.

monographous (mō-nō-grāf'us), a. [From monograph + -ous.] Monographic.

monography (mō-nō-grāf'ē), n. [= F. monographie; as monographo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γράφω, writing.] 1. A delineation in lines without colors; an outline sketch.—2. A monograph; also, a system of monographs.

In order to write a complete monography of the Kashmiri style, we ought to be able to trace it very much further back than anything in the previous pages enables us to do. J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 294.

monogyn (mon'ō-jin), n. [From μόνος, single, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. a pistil).] In bot., a plant having only one pistil or stigma.

Monogynia (mon'ō-jin'ē), n. pl. [N.L.: see monogyn.] In bot., the name of the first order in each of the first thirteen classes in the Linnean system, comprehending such plants as have only one pistil or stigma in a flower.

monogynian (mon'ō-jin'ē-an), a. [N.L. Monogynia + -an.] Pertaining to the order Monogynia; having only one pistil or stigma.

monogynist (mō-nō-jin'ist), n. [From monogyn + -ist.] One who adopts or favors monogyny.

monogynical (mon'ō-jin'ē-ik), a. [From monogyn, single, + N.L. gynecium + -al.] In bot., formed by the pistil of one flower; applied to simple fruits.

monogynous (mō-nō-jin'us), a. [From monogyn + -ous.] 1. Having only one wife; living in monogyny; monogamous, as a man; correlated with monandrous.—2. In zool., having only one female mate.—3. Same as monogynian.

monogyny (mō-nō-jin'ē), n. [From μόνος, single, + γυνή, female.] In zool. and anthropol., a mating with only one female or wife; the monogynous state; correlated with monandry.

monohemerous (mon'ō-hē-mē-rus), a. [From monogynoprop, prop. monogynopos, lasting one day only, < μόνος, single, + γημν, day.] In med., lasting or existing only one day.

monohydrated (mon'ō-hī-dra-ted), a. [From μόνος, single, + ύδωρ (h₂o), water: see hydrate.] Containing one molecule of water. This term was formerly applied to such acids as were regarded as formed from an acid by the addition of one molecule of water, as monohydrated nitric acid, (HNO₃), formed from the acid N₂O₅ by adding a molecule of water, H₂O.

monohydric (mon'ō-hī-drik), a. [From monohydrate + -ic.] Containing one atom of hydrogen. Specifically applied to such acids as have a single hydrogen atom replaceable by a basic atom or radical, as formic or lactic acid; and also to alcohols which by oxidation exchange two atoms of hydrogen for one of oxygen, and form acids containing the same number of carbon atoms as the alcohols from which they were derived.

Monoids (mō-nō'id), n. pl. Same as Monoids. Monoid (mō-nō'id), a. and n. [From μονοειδής, of one form, uniform, < μόνος, single, + εἶδος, form.] 1. a. In anc. pros., containing but one kind of foot; noting certain meters. Monoid meters are also called pure meters or simple meters, and distinguished from compound (epithymetrical) meters and mixed or logarithmic meters.

2. n. In math., a surface which possesses a conical point of the highest possible ($n-1$)th order.

monoidism (mon'ō-id'ē-izm), n. [From μόνος, single, + ἰδέα, idea (see idea), + -ism.] Concentration of the mind upon one thought or idea; a brooding on one subject; mild monomania. [Rare.]

It is observed that the mental condition of hypnotized 'subjects' is often one of marked monoidism of strong and one-sided attention.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III, 407.

monolatry (mō-nō-lā-trē), n. [From μόνος, single, + λατρεία, service, worship: see latra.] The idolatrous or pagan worship of one divinity; also, the worship of one God, but not necessarily with an explicit disbelief in other divinities.

Thus results a worship of one God—monolatry, as Wellhausen calls it—which is very different from genuine monotheism. Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XIX, 465.

monolith (mon'ō-lith), n. [= F. monolithe; as monolitho, < Gr. μνολίθος, monolithos, made of one stone, as a pillar or column, < μόνος, single, + λίθος, stone.] A single stone; by extension, any structure or object in stone formed of a single piece: it may be an independent monument standing alone, as an Egyptian obelisk, or a menhir, or any part of a structure, as a column.

monolithal (mon'ō-lith-al), a. [From monolith + -al.] Same as monolithic.

monolithic (mon'ō-lith'ik), a. [= F. monolithique; as monolitho, < Gr. μνολίθος, monolithos, made of one stone, as a pillar or column, < μόνος, single, + λίθος, stone.] 1. Formed of a single stone, as an obelisk or the shaft of a column.—2. Consisting of monoliths: as, a monolithic circle.—3. Of or pertaining to a monolith.

There is no doubt that their monolithic character is the principal source of the awe and wonder with which they have been regarded.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 332.

monolobite (mō-nō-lōb'it), n. [From μόνος, single, + λοβός, lobe (see lobe), + -ite.] A trilobite in which the trilobed or tripartite character of the upper surface is almost lost, as in the genus Homalonotus.

monolobular (mon'ō-lōb'ū-lār), a. [From μόνος, single, + N.L. lobulus, lobule: see lobular.] Consisting of or pertaining to a single lobe.

monolocular (mon'ō-lōk'ū-lār), a. [From μόνος, single, + L. loculus, a compartment (cell), dim. of locus, place: see loculus.] Same as unilocular.

Monolocularia (mon'ō-lōk'ū-lā-ri-ā), n. pl. [N.L.: see monolocular.] Those animals whose hearts are monolocular, or which have but one cardiac cavity. Wilder, Amer. Nat., 1887, p. 914.

monologiant, n. [From monology + -ant.] Same as monologue, 1. Minshew.

monologist (mō-nō-lō-jist), n. [= Sp. monologista; as monologue + -ist.] 1. One who talks in monologue or soliloquies.—2. A monopolizer of conversation. De Quincy.

monologue (mon'ō-lōg), n. [= F. monologue; as monologo, < Gr. μνολόγος, monologos, speaking alone or to oneself, < Gr. μόνος, alone, + λόγος, speak.] 1t. One who does all the talking. Minshew.—2t. That which is spoken by one person alone, especially—(a) a dramatic soliloquy. (b) A kind of dramatic entertainment, consisting of recitations, imitations, anecdotes, songs, etc., performed throughout by one person.

He [Charles Mathews] instituted in 1878, in imitation of Foote and Dibdin, a species of entertainment in the form of a monologue, which, under the title of "Mathews at Home," proved very successful. Amer. Cyc., XI, 270.

(c) A long speech or harangue uttered by one person, especially in the course of a conversation.

He sat at the feet of the teacher and listened with much apparent interest to monologues, not one-fifth part of which he could anyways understand. W. Black.

His [Wordsworth's] finest passages are always monologues. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 240.

monologize (mon'ō-lōg-iz), v. t.; prot. and pp. monologized, pp. monologizing. [From monologue + -ize.] To soliloquize. [Rare.]

Her lips had a habit of silently monologizing, moving in the manner of one who speaks with great rapidity, but with no audible utterance.

W. Beaudin, Children of Gibson, I.

monology (mō-nō-lō-jē), n. * [From μνολογία, simple language (taken in sense of 'a soliloquy'), < μνολόγος, speaking alone: see monologue.] The act or habit of indulging in monologues, or of monopolizing conversation by long narratives or dissertations; the habit of soliloquizing.

It was not by an in silent absorption that Coleridge persisted in monology through his whole life. De Quincy.

monomachia (mon'ō-mā'ki-ā), n. [L.L.: see monomachy.] Same as monomachy.

monomachist (mō-nō-mā'kist), n. [From monomachy + -ist.] One who fights in single combat; a duelist. [Rare.]

monomachia (mō-nō-mā'ki-ā), n. [Also monomachia; < F. monomachie; as monomachia; as monomachia, < L.L. monomachia, < Gr. μονομαχία, single combat, < μονός, single, + μάχη, fight.] A single combat; a duel.

Herodotus, Hist. I, 104.

Harry, Prince's Supper (1880).

There is to be performed a monomachy.
Combat, or duel, time, place, and weapon Agreed between us.

W. Sater and Bosley, Cure for a Cuckold, l. 2.

monomania (mon-'ō-mā-ni-ā), n. [= F. monomanie = Sp. monomania = Pg. It. monomania, < NL. monomania, < Gr. μῶν, single, + mania, madness: see mania.] 1. Insanity in which there is a more or less complete limitation of the perverted mental action to a particular field, as a specific delusion, or an impulse to do some particular thing. The other mental functions may show some signs of degeneration.—2. In popular use, an unreasonable zeal for or interest in some one thing; a craze.

Frederic was as anxious as any prince could be about the efficiency of his army. But this anxiety never degenerated into a monomania, like that which led his father to pay fancy prices for giants.

Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

Instinctive monomania, the excessive tendency to do some particular thing without intelligible motive and unrestrained by considerations of propriety, morality, or personal prudence. Persons manifesting this form of mental derangement usually have exhibited signs of more or less extensive mental degeneration. It includes suicidal insanity, homicidal insanity, dipsomania, pyromania, kleptomania, and certain forms of perverted sexual instinct. Also called impulsive insanity.—Syn. 1. Lunacy, Derangement, etc. See insanity.

monomaniac (mon-'ō-mā-ni-ak), a. and n. [= F. monomaniac = Sp. It. monomaniaco; an monomania + -ac.] 1. a. Same as monomaniacal.

2. n. 1. A person affected by monomania.—2. In law, one who is insane upon some one or more subjects, and apparently sane upon all others.

monomaniacal (mon-'ō-mā-ni-'ā-kal), a. [< monomaniac + -al.] Of or pertaining to monomania; also, afflicted with monomania.

Patients confess that they have been under the influence of monomaniacal ideas and terrible hallucinations for a long period, without their existence being suspected even by their most intimate associates.

F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain, ix.

Monomastiga (mon-'ō-mas-'ti-gū), n. pl. [NL. (in neuter) pl. of Monomastix.] A division of flagellate infusorians having one flagellum, as the Monadida, etc.; distinguished from Dinmastiga.

monomastigate (mon-'ō-mas-'ti-gāt), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + μάστιξ (mástix), a whip, scourge.] Having one flagellum; uniflagellate: said of the Monomastiga.

Monomastix (mon-'ō-mas-'tiks), n. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + μάστιξ (mástix), a whip, scourge.] A genus of uniflagellate infusorians proposed by Dierking in 1850, giving name to the Monomastiga.

monome (mon-'ōm), n. [< F. monôme = Sp. Pg. It. monomia, < NL. "monomium, for "mononomium, < Gr. μῶν, single, + L. nom(en), name. Hence monomial, < Gr. binomial.] Same as monomial.

Monomerat (mō-nom-'e-rāt), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + μέρος (méros), a part, single: see monomerous.] A section of coleopterous insects proposed by Latreille for the reception of certain minute species. It is now known that his observations were imperfect, these insects having really several tarsal joints, and pertaining to families which Latreille had included in other groups.

Monomerosomata (mō-nom-'e-rō-sō-ma-tā), n. pl. [NL. see monomerosomatous.] The acarids or mites as an order of tracheate arachnidans; the Acarida or Acariden. In Leach's system there were 4 orders of Arachnida: Dimerosomata, spiders; Polymerosomata, scorpions, etc.; Unimerosomata, mites; and Podomata, the Pycnomida. Westwood interposed Adelarthrosomata between the second and the third of these.

monomerosomatous (mō-nom-'e-rō-som-'a-tus), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, consisting of one part (see monomerous), + σῶμα (sōma), body.] Having the body all in one piece or mass—that is, apparently unsegmented—as an acarid: of or pertaining to the Monomerosomata, or having their characters, as a mite: distinguished from dimerosomatous, polymerosomatous, etc.

monomerous (mō-nom-'e-rus), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, consisting of one part, < μῶν, single, + μέρος, part.] 1. In zool., having the tarsi single-jointed; unarticulate, as a tarsus; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomera.—2. In bot., having but one member in each eye (pistil, stamen, petal, or sepal): said of a flower. Compare dimerous, 2.

monometallic (mon-'ō-me-tal'ik), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + μέταλλον, metal: see metal.] Consisting of but one metal; specifically, comprising coins that consist of but one metal (or alloy), as gold or silver: as, a monometallic currency.

monometallism (mon-'ō-met-'al-izm), n. [< monometallic + -ism.] The use of only one metal as a standard of value in the coinage of a country; also, the economic theory that advocates such a single standard. See biometallism.

monometallist (mon-'ō-met-'al-ist), n. [< monometallic + -ist.] One who advocates the theory of monometallism: opposed to biometallist.

monometer (mō-nom-'e-ter), a. and n. [< L.L. monometer, as a noun monometron, < Gr. μῶν, single, consisting of one measure, < μῶν, single, + μέρος, a measure: see meter.] 1. a. In prog., consisting of a single measure.

2. n. In prog., a meter consisting of a single measure.

monometric (mon-'ō-met-'rik), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + μέρος, measure. Cf. monometer.] In crystal, same as isometric, 2.

monometrical (mon-'ō-met-'ri-kal), a. [< monometer + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or consisting of monometers; containing only one meter.

monomial (mō-nō-mi-'al), a. and n. [< monome (NL. "monomium") + -al. Cf. binomial, multinomial, polynomial. See also mononomial.] 1. a. 1. In alg., consisting of only one term, and not of several added together.—2. In zool. and bot., same as mononomial.—Monomial differentiant. See differentiant.

2. n. In alg., an expression or quantity consisting of a single term. See binomial. Also monome.

Monomorium (mon-'ō-mō-'ri-um), n. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + μέρος, dim. of μέρος, a part, piece.] A genus of Formicidae, having the metathorax unarmed, the mandibles narrow, and the antennae 11- or 12-jointed. It is wide-spread, with many species, among them the common little red ant, M. pharaonis. This well-known domestic pest America owes to Europe, though it has generally been considered of American origin; it is now almost cosmopolitan. It does no great damage, but is troublesome from its myriads, its habit of overrunning almost everything in the house that is eatable, and the great difficulty or impossibility of its extermination.

monomorphic (mon-'ō-mor-'fik), a. [As monomorphous + -ic.] 1. In zool., of one and the same (or essentially similar) type of structure; formed much alike; notably uniform in morphological character: said of a number of animals collectively, or of the zoological group which they constitute: as, birds are a highly monomorphic class of animals.—2. In entom., having but one form, structure, or morphological character; identical or invariable in form throughout successive stages of development; monomorphous; homomorphous; aribolobol.

monomorphous (mon-'ō-mor-'fus), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + μορφή, form.] 1. Same as monomorphic in any sense.—2. Of invariable form: specifically applied to certain neuropterous insects which in their larval state are similar in form to the perfect insect, though wingless.

monomphalus (mō-nom-'fa-lus), n. [pl. monomphali (-li).] [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + φάληξ, navel.] In teratol., a double monster, each person being nearly complete, but united with the other in a common umbilicus.

Monomyaria (mon-'ō-mi-'ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + μέρος, muscle, + -aria.] An order of bivalve mollusks with a single adductor muscle, or with one such muscle enlarged at the expense of another, subcentral in position and remote from the pallial margin. The order contains the scallops, oysters, pearl-oysters, and related forms, and is nearly coincident with Amphimorpha. See cat under abductor.

monomyarian (mon-'ō-mi-'ā-ri-an), a. and n. [< Monomyaria + -an.] 1. a. Having one adduc-tor muscle, as an oyster; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomyaria. Also monomyary.

2. n. A monomyarian bivalve mollusk.

monomyary (mon-'ō-mi-'ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. monomyaire, < NL. Monomyaria.] Same as monomyarian.

Mononeura (mon-'ō-nū-'rā), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + νῆρ, nerve.] Animals with only a ganglionic nervous system. Zygodont.

mononomial (mon-'ō-nō-mi-'al), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + L. nom(en), name: see nominal. Cf. monomial.] In zool. and bot., consisting of a single word or term: applied to the name of an animal or a plant: opposed to binomial and polynomial. Cones, The Auk, l. 320. Also monomial.

mononuclear (mon-'ō-nū-'klē-ār), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + L. nucleus, nucleus: see nuclear.] Having a single nucleus; uninuclear: as, large mononuclear cells. Haeppel, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 68.

Mononychia (mon-'ō-ni-'ki-nō), n. pl. [NL. < Mononyx (-onyx) + -ia.] A subfamily of Staphylinidae, typified by the genus Mononyx. It contains heteropterous insects of flattened form, truncate in front, rounded behind, and rough on top; of dull or dark color; and with the fore legs raptorial, fitted for clutching insect prey.

mononym (mon-'ō-nim), n. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + ὄνομα, onoma, a name: see onym.] A name consisting of a single term: a mononomial name in zoology. Cones, The Auk, l. 321.

mononymic (mon-'ō-nim-'ik), a. [< mononym + -ic.] Having but one name; named in one word; mononomial: applied in zoology to a system of nomenclature in which the name of each species is a single word: opposed to dinymal and polynymic.

In a mononymic system we should require as many separate names as there are objects to be named.

J. W. Dunning, Entomol. Monthly Mag., VIII. 274.

mononymisation (mon-'ō-nim-i-'sā-shn), n. [< mononymize + -ation.] The substitution of a single word for several which had been used together as the name of something, as the employment of the name iter for a part of the brain usually called iter tertio ad quartum ventriculum. [Rare.]

The desired mononymisation is best attained by simply dropping the superfluous gentile (in the phrase "tercolum lumbale").

Black's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 580, note.

mononymize (mon-'ō-nim-iz), v. t.; prot. and pp. mononymized, pp. mononymizing. [< mononym + -ize.] To convert (a polynomial name) into a mononym.

Mononyx (mon-'ō-niks), n. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + ὄνυξ, a nail: see onyx.] In entom.: (a) The typical genus of Mononychiinae, founded by Laporte in 1837. M. amplipennis is a large, broad South American species; M. stygia is found in the southern United States. (b) An unused genus of coleopterous insects. Brullé, 1838.

monobusian (mon-'ō-b'-'si-ān), a. Same as monobusian.

monobusious (mon-'ō-b'-'si-us), a. [< L.Gr. μῶν, single, consisting of one essence, < Gr. μῶν, single, + οὐσία, ou-sia, essence: see ou-sia.] pp. of ou-sia, be: see ou-sia. Cf. monobusious.] Having the same substance; consisting of the same matter: used to describe the Sabellian confounding of God the Father and God the Son.

monoparesis (mon-'ō-pur-'e-sis), n. [NL. < Gr. μῶν, single, + πάρεσις, a weakening, paralysis: see paresis.] In pathol., the paresis of a single part of the body, as of one limb.

monopathic (mon-'ō-path-'ik), a. [< monopathy + -ic.] In pathol., involving the disorder of only one organ or function: said of disease.

monopathy (mō-nop-'a-thi), n. [< L.Gr. μῶν, single, suffering in one part of the body only. Cf. Gr. μῶν, single, + πάθος, suffering.] 1. Solitary suffering or sensibility.

Every one calculated his nativity, and wretchedly his own future fate, by crying at his birth, not coming only from the body's monopathy, or sole suffering by change of its quarters; but, according to some, from sympathy with the divine soul, that knoweth itself for a time banished from the Father of spirits.

Whitlock, Manners of the English (1654), p. 32. (Latham.)

2. In pathol., a disease or affection in which only one organ or function is disordered.

monopersonal (mon-'ō-pér-'son-'al), a. [< Gr. μῶν, single, + L. persona, person: see personal.] In theol., having but one person or one mode of existence.

monopetalous (mon-'ō-pet-'a-lus), a. [= F. monopétale = Sp. monopétalo = Pg. It. monopetalo, < Gr. μῶν, single, + πῆλον, leaf (pet- al.) In bot., having the petals united into one piece by their edges: more properly gamopetalous or sympetalous.

monophanous (mō-nōf'ā-nus), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, alone, + φανήναι, appear.] Having an appearance similar to something else; resembling each other. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

Monophlebites (mō-nōf'lē-bī'tēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φλέψ (φλέξ), a vein, + -ites, E. -ite.] A tribe or section of the homopterous subfamily Coccinae, including the largest bark-like known. Some Australian forms are nearly two inches long.

monophobia (mō-nōf'ō-bī-ki), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φόβος, fear (> φόβος, fear).] In pathol., morbid dread of being left alone.

monophonic (mō-nōf'ō-nīk), a. [< monophony + -ic.] Same as monodic.

monophonous (mō-nōf'ō-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, with but one voice or sound, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φωνή, voice.] Producing a single sound or note at one time: said of an instrument.

monophony (mō-nōf'ō-nī), n. [As monophony + -y.] Same as monody, 1.

monophote (mō-nōf'ō-tē), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φως (φωρ), light.] An electric arc-lamp regulator designed to work in single series, or on the parallel-arc system, between the leads of an electric-light circuit. More fully named monophoto regulator.

monophthalmus (mō-nōf'ō-thāl'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄφθαλμος, the eye.] In teratol., a monster with one eye; a cyclops.

The term monophthalmus unilateralis would seem to serve better . . . than the term monophthalmus, given by some writers. Medical News, 181. 189.

monophthong (mō-nōf'ō-thōng), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φθόγγος, of or with but one sound, containing but one vowel; as a noun, a single vowel; < μόνος, single, + φθίγγος, sound.] 1. A simple vowel-sound.

Again, the sound of the so-called long English a in make, paper, day, although once a monophthong, is now pronounced as a diphthong. Engl. Brit., XVIII. 782.

2. A combination of two written vowels pronounced as one.

monophthongal (mō-nōf'ō-thōng-gal), a. [< monophthong + -al.] Consisting of or pertaining to a monophthong.

monophthongization (mō-nōf'ō-thōng-gī-zā'shōn), n. [< monophthongize + -ation.] The reduction of a diphthong to a single sound.

Examples of the monophthongization of e, so far as they are found in the text of the Homeric poems. Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 421.

monophthongize (mō-nōf'ō-thōng-gīz), v. t.; pret., and pp., monophthongized, pp., monophthongizing. [< monophthong + -ize.] To reduce in enunciation to a single sound.

A monophthongized diphthong. Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 435.

monophyletic (mō-nōf'ī-lē'tīk), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλη, a tribe, > φέλεται, a tribesman, φέλεται, belonging to a tribe: see phylum.] Of or pertaining to a single phylum: said of a group of any grade in zoology, with reference to the origin of all the members of such group from a common ancestor: opposed to polyphyletic. The monophyletic hypothesis, in its logical application to the animal kingdom, derives all animals from a single proto-type: it is equivalent to the monogenetic hypothesis in phylogeny.

My gastrula theory, on which I base the monophyletic genealogy of the animal kingdom. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), 1. 247.

monophyllitic (mō-nōf'ī-lī'tīk), a. An erroneous form of monophyletic.

Phyllitic origin, so far from being improbable, is as likely an occurrence as monophyletic origin. Schäfer, Kuey. Brit., XXII. 428.

monophylline (mō-nōf'ī-lī'n), a. [As monophyllous + -ine.] Same as monophyllous.

monophyllous (mō-nōf'ī-lūs), a. [= F. monophyllé = Gr. μονοφύλλος = It. monofillo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having but one leaf; formed of one leaf.

Monophyllus (mō-nōf'ī-lūs), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλλον, leaf: see monophyllous.] A genus of leaf-nosed bats of the family Phyllostomidae, founded by Leach in 1822. M. robustus is a West Indian species, about 12 inches in extent, and of a grayish-brown color.

monophyodont (mō-nōf'ī-ō-dont), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, of simple nature, single, as teeth (< μόνος, single, + φέρω, produce), + ὄδων (ὄδον) = E. tooth.] 1. a. Having only one set of teeth: opposed to diphyodont and polyphyodont.

II. n. An animal having only one set of teeth.

Monophyodonta (mō-nōf'ī-ō-don'tā), n. pl. [NL.: see monophyodont.] A division of mammals containing those which are monophyodont, as the cetaceans. Sir R. Owen.

Monophysite (mō-nōf'ī-sīt), n. and a. [= F. monophysite, < Gr. μονοφύσις, one who held that Christ has but one nature, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύσις, nature: see physis.] 1. n. One who holds that there is but one nature in Christ; more specifically, one of a sect which teaches that there is but one commingled or compound nature in Christ, partly divine and partly human, in contradistinction to the orthodox doctrine that by the incarnation two complete and perfect natures, the divine and the human, are united without confusion or mutation in the one person of Christ. Among Monophysites in the wider sense are included the Eutychians and Monothelites. The sect of Eutychians was founded by Eutyches, who was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. They taught that there is but one nature in Christ, the divine. The Monophysites properly so called hold that the divine and human natures in Christ are combined into one composite nature. The first leaders of the Monophysites, and founders of the present Monophysite or Coptic Church of Egypt, were Dioscorus, condemned at Chalcedon (died A. D. 484), and Timothy Ilerus ("Cat"), made patriarch A. D. 487. In later times their most important leader was Severus, about A. D. 520, whose followers were called Severians, Corruptors, or Phthartodotae, while those of an opposite Monophysite sect were known as Julianists, Aphthartodotae, and Phanasiasts. In the sixth century the Monophysites spread widely in Syria, and were named Jacobites, from Jacob Baradaeus, Bishop of Edessa, 541-78. At various times the Monophysites divided into a great number of sects, known by more than thirty different titles. These represented different shades of original Eutychianism and Monophysitism and attempts at approach to orthodoxy. The most subtle form of Monophysitism is Monothelitism (which see). Monophysitism is at the opposite pole of doctrine to Nestorianism, the orthodox doctrine as to the nature of Christ lying midway between the two. As distinguished from the Monophysites, the orthodox are called Diphytists and Melchites. At the present day the two great bodies of Monophysites are the Copts and the Syrian Jacobites. The Armenian Church is also often regarded as Monophysite or Eutychian, and the Maronites before their submission to the Roman Church were Monothelites. See Acrophis (b), Agnetes, Theopaschite, Trithelite.

II. a. Same as Monophysitist.

Monophysitism (mō-nōf'ī-sīt'iz-m), n. [< Monophysite + -ism.] Of or pertaining to the Monophysites or their doctrines; of the nature of the doctrines of the Monophysites.

Monophysitism (mō-nōf'ī-sīt'iz-m), n. [< Monophysite + -ism.] The doctrines of the Monophysites. Compare diphytism.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism, or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature. It makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine nature. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

monoplacid (mō-nō-plas-id), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλάσις, a flat cake: see placenta.] Having but one madreporic plate, as a starfish: distinguished from polyplacid.

monoplacula (mō-nō-plak'ū-lā), n.; pl. monoplaula (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. placula, q. v.] A single-layered germ; a placula of one layer of cells, formed by vertical fission of the germ: opposed to duploplacula. Hytt, Proc. Bot. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1884, p. 80.

monoplaular (mō-nō-plak'ū-lār), a. [< monoplacula + -ar.] Single-layered, as a germ; having the characteristics of a monoplaula.

monoplaulate (mō-nō-plak'ū-lāt), a. [< monoplacula + -ate.] Same as monoplaular. A. Hyett.

monoplast (mō-nō-plāst), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλάστος, formed, molded, < πλάσσω, form, mold.] An organism consisting of a single cell; a simple or homogeneous form-element.

monoplastic (mō-nō-plas'tīk), a. [< monoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a monoplast.

monoplegia (mō-nō-plē'jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πlegē, stroke.] In pathol., paralysis limited to a single part, as of one arm or leg. Compare hemiplegia, paraplegia.

monopleurobranch (mō-nō-plē'ūrō-brang), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλέρω, side, + ἄσπλητος, gills.] 1. a. Having gills on only one side; of or pertaining to the Monopleurobranchiata.

II. n. A member of the Monopleurobranchiata.

Monopleurobranchia (mō-nō-plē'ūrō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] Same as Monopleurobranchiata.

monopleurobranchian (mō-nō-plē'ūrō-brang'ki-an), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ian.] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopleurobranchiata (mō-nō-plē'ūrō-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] A suborder of opisthobranchiate gastropoda having plumose gills usually on one side, the right, under the edge of the mantle. This name was proposed by De Hahn in 1825 as that of the third order of his Paracéphalopoda monota, divided into 4 families, as the sea-hares and their allies. It is synonymous with Tectibranchiata of Cuvier. The group is also called Panoplobranchiata. Also Monopleurobranchia. J. E. Gray, 1831.

monopleurobranchiate (mō-nō-plē'ūrō-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ate.] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopneumona (mō-nōp-nū'mō-nā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see Monopneumones.] A division of Dipneusta or Dipnoi, containing those dipnoans which are single-lunged: distinguished from Dipneumona. The only existing representative is Ceratodus.

Monopneumones (mō-nōp-nū'mō-nēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πνεύμων, lung, usually pl. πνεύματα, the lungs.] Same as Monopneumona.

Monopneumonia (mō-nōp-nū'mō-nī-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see Monopneumones.] Same as Monopneumona.

monopneumonian (mō-nōp-nū'mō-nī-an), a. and n. [As Monopneumonia + -an.] 1. a. Having only one lung: specifically applied to the Monopneumonia.

II. n. A lung-fish, as Ceratodus.

monopneumonous (mō-nōp-nū'mō-nus), a. [As Monopneumones + -ous.] Having only one lung; of or pertaining to the Monopneumones, Monopneumones, or Monopneumonia.

Monopnoea (mō-nōp-nō-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πνέω, breathing, < πνέω, breathe.] In Owen's classification, a "subclass of Reptilia," containing all reptiles which breathe in one way only—that is, by lungs: distinguished from Dipnoa or Brachiotora, which breathe in two ways—that is, either by gills first and lungs afterward in the case of the same individual, or some of them by gills and others by lungs. In this scheme, not easy to define satisfactorily, Iktol. Owen makes his "class Reptilia" cover not only Reptilia in the usual sense, but also Amphibia or Batrachia. His Dipnoa are then continuous with Amphibia proper. He divides Monopnoea into the orders Pterosauria, Dinosauria, Crocodylia, Chelonida, Lacertilia, Ophidia, Anomodontia, Saurpterygia, and Ichthyopterygia. Comp. Anat. Vert. (1869), III. 550.

monopode (mō-nō-pōd), a. and n. [Cf. L.L. monopodia, one-footed, L. monopodium, a table or stand with one foot, < Gr. μόνος (monos), one-footed, < μόνος, single, + ποδς (pod) = E. foot.] 1. a. Having but one foot.

II. n. 1. Any object supported on one foot only; specifically, one of a fabrid race of men having but one leg. These, the Monopodes or Scelopodes, are described by Pliny (Hist. Nat., viii.) as dwelling in Ethiopia, and as possessing a single foot, so large that it served when held up to shade them from the sun when they lay down to rest.

The monopodes, sheltering themselves from the sun beneath their single umbrella-like foot. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 172.

2. In bot., same as monopodium.

monopodial (mō-nō-pō-dī-āl), a. [< monopodium + -al.] Reminding of or after the manner of a monopodium.

monopodie (mō-nō-pō-dīk), a. [As monopody + -ic.] In pros., constituting a single foot; of or pertaining to a single foot, or a measure consisting in a single foot: as, monopodic measure: opposed to dipodie.

monopodium (mō-nō-pō-dī-um), n.; pl. monopodia (-i). [NL., neut. of L.L. monopodium, < Gr. μόνος, single, + ποδς, foot: see monopode.] In bot., an axis of growth which continues to extend at the apex in the direction of previous growth, while lateral structures of like kind are produced beneath it in acropetal succession. (Goebel, Compare sympodium and dichotomy.)

monopody (mō-nō-pō-dī), n.; pl. monopodies (-iz). [< L.L. monopodia, < Gr. μόνος, single, + ποδς, foot, esp. as a measure, < μόνος, single, + ποδς (pod) = E. foot.] In pros., a measure consisting of but one foot: opposed to dipody. See measure, 11.

monopolist, n. [< OF. monopolier (F. monopolier), < monopole, monopoly: see monopoly.] A monopolist. Cotgrave.

monopolistic (mō-nō-pō-līstīk), a. [< monopoly + -ic.] Mtropolistic.

I wish, according to the decree of Justice, that whosoever is an enemy to our peace, and wealth, either by getting monopolies or by forging false tales, to hinder our welfare, that his house was pulled down.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 32.

monopolization, monopolize, etc. See monopolization, etc.

monopolist (mō-nop'ō-list), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. monopolista; as monopoly + -ist.] 1. One who monopolizes or possesses a monopoly; one who has exclusive command or control of any branch of trade or article of commerce; specifically, a buyer up of the whole of a commodity in market for the purpose of selling at an advanced price; one having a license or privilege granted by authority for the sole buying or selling of any commodity. See monopoly.—2. One who obtains, assumes, or occupies anything to the exclusion of others: as, a monopolist of advantages.

monopolistic (mō-nop'ō-lis'tik), a. [(monopolist + -ic).] Relating to a monopoly or to a system of monopolies; of a kind promoted by monopoly; existing for the maintenance of a monopoly: as, monopolistic abuses; a monopolistic corporation.

monopolitism (mō-nop'ō-lis'tizm), n. [As monopolist + -ism, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolitan, etc.] A monopolist.

See was no diving politician,
Or project seeking monopolization.

John Taylor, Works (1830). (Nares.)

Monopolists of starch, tin, fish, cloth, oil, vinegar, salt, and what not.

Quoted in Olden's Sir Walter Raleigh.

monopolize (mō-nop'ō-liz), v. [(monopoly + -ize, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolite).] Same as monopolist.

You marchant Mercers, and Monopolizers, Gain-greedy 'chap-men, perjur'd Hypocrites.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Works, I. 2.

monopolization (mō-nop'ō-liz-ā'shən), n. [(monopolize + -ation).] The act or process of monopolizing. Also spelled monopolisation.

monopolize (mō-nop'ō-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monopolized, ppr. monopolizing. [= F. monopoliser = Sp. monopolizar = Pg. monopolizar; as monopoly + -ize.] 1. To obtain a monopoly of; have an exclusive right of trading in: as, to monopolize all the corn in a district.

The Arabs have a law that, if three camels depart at the same time, the convent shall be obliged to pay thirty piastres: which I suppose is designed to prevent any one Arab with several camels monopolizing the whole business of conveying the monks.

Pecceke, Description of the East, I. 150.

2. To obtain or engross the whole of; obtain exclusive possession of.

As if this age had monopolized all goodness & truth.

Gold alone does Passion move,
(Gold monopolizes Love!)

Cowley, Anacreontics, vii.

Also spelled monopolise.

monopolizer (mō-nop'ō-liz-ēr), n. Same as monopolist, especially in sense 2: as, a monopolizer of conversation. Also spelled monopoliser.

Those senseless monopolizers of time that form the court of a duke.

Shelley, in Dowden, I. 204.

monopoly (mō-nop'ō-li), n.; pl. monopolies (-liz). [= F. monopole = Sp. Pg. It. monopolio, < L. monopolium, < Gr. μονοπώλιον, a right of exclusive sale, μονω, exclusive sale, monopoly, < μῶν, sole, + πωλείν, barter, sale.] 1. An exclusive privilege to carry on a traffic.

Monopolies are much the same offence in other branches of trade that engrossing is in provisions, being a license or privilege allowed by the king for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of any thing whatsoever: whereby the subject in general is restrained from that liberty of manufacturing or trading which he had before.

Blackstone, Com. (ed. Waite), IV. 150.

2. Specifically, in Eng. constitutional hist., and hence sometimes in Amer. law, such an exclusive privilege when granted by the crown or state to an individual, association, or corporation, for the sake of the pecuniary advantage of its exclusiveness. A privilege not granted by the state, but secured by buying up the article, is termed by the English law engrossing. The legal objection to a monopoly, in this sense of the word, is that it can be secured only by forbidding all other citizens except the favored grantee to exercise a common-law right. Exclusive privileges granted by the state to a limited number of persons for the sake of enabling the state the better to regulate the traffic for the protection of the rest of the community, as in case of banking franchises, liquor traffic, etc., are not deemed monopolies, although the same privileges would be, if conferred on a single or a very few grantees, for the sake of the pecuniary benefit to them. Such exclusive privileges conferred on inventors and authors, by the patent and copyright laws, for the sake of the encouragement of the arts and manufactures, and extending only to articles originally devised under that encouragement, are not deemed monopolies.

See. Both these classes of grants have, however, been condemned by some as partaking of the character of monopolies.

If any man, out of his own wit, industry, or endeavour, find out anything beneficial to the commonwealth, or bring out any new invention which every subject of this kingdom may use, yet, in regard of his pains and travel therein, her Majesty perhaps is pleased to grant him a privilege to use the same only, by himself or his deputies, for a certain time. This is one kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a gift of things, when they be in excessive quantity, as perhaps of corn; and perhaps her Majesty gives license of transportation to one man. This is another kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a scarcity or a small quantity; and the like is granted also.

Bacon, in E. A. Abbott's Account of his Life and Works.

I will have no private monopolies, to enrich one man, and beggar a multitude.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 63.

He thinks he can never trade to his advantage unless he can have the monopoly of everything he values.

Smith, S. In polit. econ., and as used in a general sense in law, such an exclusive privilege to carry on a traffic, or deal in or control a given class of articles, as will enable the holder to raise prices materially above what they would be if the traffic or dealing were free to citizens generally. In this sense, that exclusive control of a particular kind of product which results from the legitimate ownership of the only land from which it can be obtained, as in the case of some mineral waters, or earths, or ores, is sometimes spoken of as a natural monopoly, in contrast to the artificial monopoly created by state grant. See virtual monopoly, below.

4. That which is the subject of a monopoly: as, in Bengal opium is a monopoly.—5. The possession or assumption of anything to the exclusion of other possessors: thus, a man is popularly said to have a monopoly of any business of which he has acquired complete control.

Jonson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy to posterity that knowledge, and to make a monopoly of his learning.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Ded.

Caleb hasn't no monopoly to court the seamstress.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., II.

6. Loosely, a company or corporation which enjoys a monopoly.—Monopoly Act, an English statute of 1823 (21 Jas. I. c. 8), declaring all monopolies for the manufacture, sale, or use of anything to be void, excepting to inventors their patent rights. Also known as the Statute of Monopolies.—Virtual monopoly, a term in constitutional law and the history of legislation (the appropriate applications of which have been much contested) used to characterize a business which, though not declared by law to be a monopoly or exclusive franchise protected as such, as by a patent or an exclusive charter, is yet so related to the great channels and currents of commerce that the allowing of it to enjoy the same protection as other private property and business secures to it indirectly exclusive advantages substantially equivalent to a legal monopoly. Thus the great grain-elevators of modern commerce, although erected as private property on private lands, if by their situation they have exclusive advantages for the transfer of grain from vessels at the wharf to the railroad terminals of a trunk-line, are said to constitute a virtual monopoly, because, if not subjected to a legislative power to restrict their charges such as other private property and business are not subjected to, they might be conducted in a manner oppressive to commerce.

monopolyloguet (mō-nop'ō-lō-jēt), n. [(Gr. μῶν, single, + λόγος, much talking, < λόγος, many, much, + λέγω, speak.) An entertainment in which a single actor sustains many characters. Brande.

monoprionidian (mō-nop'ri-ō-nid'i-an), a. [(Gr. μῶν, single, + πρίον, a saw (< πρίον, saw), + -ιδιον, dim. suffix, + -αν.] Having small unilateral serrations; uniserrate: specifically applied to those graptolites or rhizodophorous colonizers which have the cells or hydrothecae in a single row: opposed to diprionidian.

monopteral (mō-nop'te-ral), a. [(Gr. μονόπτερος, < Gr. μῶν, single, + πτερόν, wing, or alate part.] 1. In arch., formed as a monopteron.—2. In zool., having a single fin, wing, or alate part.

Monopteridæ (mō-nop'te-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monopterus + -idæ.] A family of symbranchiate teleostean fishes, typified by the genus Monopterus, having the shoulder-girdle directly connected with the skull, and the abdominal and caudal regions of the body excessively elongated.

monopteron, monopteros (mō-nop'te-rōn, -rōs), n. [= F. monoptère = Sp. monoptero, < L. monopteros, < Gr. μονόπτερος, with only one row of pillars, < μῶν, single, + πτερόν, a wing, a row of columns along the sides of a Greek temple.] In arch., a type of temple or portico, usually with an inclined circular cells, composed of columns arranged in a circle and supporting a cupola or a conical roof.

Plan of Monopteron.

Monopteron.—Temple of Vesta at Tivoli, near Rome.

Monopterus (mō-nop'te-rus), n. [NL. (cf. Gr. μονόπτερος, lit. having one wing (see monopteron), < Gr. μῶν, single, + πτερόν, a wing.) The typical genus of Monopteridæ, containing anguilliform or eel-like fishes whose fin-system is reduced to a continuous marginal membrane around the tail. M. javanicus is a common fish of the Indian archipelago, about 8 feet long.

monopterygian (mō-nop'te-rī-jī-an), n. and n. i. a. Pertaining to the Monopterygia, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopterygian fish. Monopterygii (mō-nop'te-rī-jī-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶν, single, + πτερίς (πτερυς), fin.] Fishes whose fins are reduced to one. Bloch and Schneider.

monoptote (mō-nop'tōt), n. [= F. monoptote, < L. monoptotus (in neut. pl. monoptota), < Gr. μονόπτερος, with but one case, < Gr. μῶν, single, + πτερόν (πτερος), case, < πτερόν, fall.] In gram., a noun or an adjective having but one case-form. A monoptote may be (a) a word with only one case in use, or (b) a word with but one case form which may be used for several or for all cases.

monopus (mō-nop'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, one-footed, < μῶν, single, + πούς (ποδ-) = F. foot.] In zool., a monster having but a single foot or hind limb.

Monopylea (mō-nop'il-ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶν, single, + πύλη, a gate.] A division of Phlebotoma, containing those phlebotomans which have only one pseudopodal opening: opposed to Amphipyloa.

monopylean (mō-nop'il-ē-an), a. and n. [As Monopylea + -an.] 1. a. Having one pore or pseudopodal opening: pertaining to the Monopylea, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopylean radiolarian. monopyrenous (mō-nop'ir-ē-nus), a. [= F. monopyrene, < Gr. μῶν, single, + πύρη, the stone of a fruit.] In bot., having but one navel or stone.

monorchid (mō-nōr'kid), a. [(Gr. μονόρχις, after orchid.] Having only one testicle; exhibiting or characterized by monorchism.

monorchis (mō-nōr'kis), n.; pl. monorchides (-ki-dēs). [(Gr. μῶν, single, + ὄρχις, testicle.) An animal or a person having only one testicle.

Monorchides, as they are called, have been known to be prolific.

A. S. Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence, p. 724.

monorchism (mō-nōr'kizim), n. [As monorchis + -ism.] The presence of only one testicle.

monorganic (mō-nōr-gan'ik), a. [(Gr. μῶν, single, + ὄργανον, organ: see organic.] Pertaining to or affecting one organ or set of organs.

Monorhina (mō-nō-rī-nā), n. pl. [NL.: see monorhine.] A primary division of the Vertebrata, or other major group of vertebrates, represented by the Maripolobranchii (Cyclanopteri or roundmouths), the lampreys and hags (Hyperotreta and Hyperosticta), in which the nasal passage is single: distinguished from all other cranial vertebrates, or Amphirrhina. Also, more correctly, Monorhina.

monorhinal (mō-nō-rī-nal), a. [(Gr. μονόρχις + -al.] Having the nostril single; monorhine.

monorhine (mō-nō-rīn), a. and n. [(Gr. μῶν, single, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), the nose.) 1. a. Having but one nasal passage: single-nostrilled: specifically applied to the Monorhina.

II. n. A monorhinal vertebrate, as a lamprey or a hag.

Also spelled monorrhine.

monorime, monorhyme (mon-'ō-rīm), n. [= F. monorime, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + *E. rime*².] A composition in verse in which all the lines end with the same rime.

Monorrhina, monorrhine. More correct forms of Monorhina, monorhine.

monoschemic (mon-'ō-skē-'mīk), n. [Gr. μῶνος, of but one form, < μῶνος, single, + σχῆμα, form.] In anc. pros., consisting of one form of foot throughout; containing spondee only or dactyls only; noting a variety of the dactylic hexameter. A hexameter said to contain only dactyls necessarily lacks the last syllable of the last dactyl, that is, contains five dactyls and a trochee. See docthrinal.

monosemic (mon-'ō-sē-'mīk), n. [Gr. μῶνος, having but one signification, < μῶνος, single, + σημα, a sign, mark, < σημαίνω, a sign, mark, unit of time, mora.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to a single semion (mora or unit of time); equivalent to or constituting an ordinary or normal short; monochronous; as, a monosemic arsis; a monosemic pause. See di-semic, trimeter.

monosepalous (mon-'ō-sep-'ā-lus), n. [= F. monosépale; < Gr. μῶνος, single, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having the sepals united by their edges: more properly gamosepalous.

monosiphonous (mon-'ō-sī-'fŏn-us), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σῆψω, siphon: see siphon.] Having a single siphon; not polysiphonous; applied in botany to certain of the higher algae (Floridæ) in which the siphons or pericentral tubes are wanting. See siphon.

monosis (mō-'nō-'sis), n. [Gr. μῶνος, solitariness, separation, < μῶνος, make single or solitary, < μῶνος, single: see monad.] In bot., the isolation of an organ from the rest. Cooke, Manual.

Monosomata (mon-'ō-sō-'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monosomatus: see monosomatous.] An order of Rhizopoda, containing simple single-celled or unicellular forms, naked or encapsulated, such as the families Proteidae and Arcellidae. They are the ordinary normal amoebiform protozoans.

monosomatous (mon-'ō-sōm-'ā-tus), a. [NL., monosomatus, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + σῶμα (sōma), body.] Having a single body—that is, cell; unicellular, as a rhizopod.

monospasm (mon-'ō-spā-zm), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπασμός, a spasm.] In pathol., spasm of a particular part, as a limb or portion of a limb.

monosperm (mon-'ō-spērm), n. [= F. monosperme; < Sp. monosperma, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπέρμα, seed: see sperm.] A plant that has only one seed.

monospermal (mon-'ō-spēr-'māl), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπέρμα, seed.] Same as monospermous.

monospermous (mon-'ō-spēr-'mus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., having one seed only.

monospherical (mon-'ō-sfēr-'ī-kāl), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σφαῖρα, sphere: see spherical.] Consisting of or having a single sphere.

monospondylic (mon-'ō-spond-'īl'īk), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπονδυλῖος, a joint of the backbone.] Having a single centrum, as a vertebra; without intercentrum, as a vertebral column; not diplospondylic or embolomerous.

monosporous (mon-'ō-spor-'us), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed, + -ed.] Same as monosporous.

monosporous (mon-'ō-spor-'us), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed.] In mycol., having but a single spore, as the threads of Garia intricata or the ascus of Pertusaria communis.

monostachous (mō-'nōs-'tā-kus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + στάχυς, an ear of corn, a spike.] In bot., having a single spike.

Monostega (mō-'nōs-'tē-gē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostegus: see monostegous.] A division of foraminifera.

monostegous (mō-'nōs-'tē-gus), a. [NL., monostegus, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + στέγος, for (to) cover, a roof.] Having a single covering; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monostegia.

monostich (mon-'ō-stīk), n. [= F. monostique = Sp. monostico, monostiquo = It. monostico, < LL. mon-stichum, monostichium, < Gr. μονόστιχος, consisting of but one verse, neut. μονόστιχος, a single verse, < μῶνος, single, + στίχος, a line, verse.] A single or isolated verse; also, an epigram or a poem consisting of but one verse.

monostichous (mō-'nōs-'tī-kus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + στίχος, a line. Cf. monostich.] Arranged in one vertical row, rank, or series, as the flowers in the spike of some species of Spiranthes; uniserial: opposed to distichous.

monostigmatous (mon-'ō-stīg-'mā-tus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + στίγμα, point, stigma: see stigma.] In bot., having only one stigma.

Monostomata (mon-'ō-stō-'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostomatus: see monostomatous.] 1. A suborder of aculephs, or discophoran Hydroids; same as Monostomata.—2. A prime series or division of Metazoa, including all metazoic animals excepting the sponges or Polysomata. Huxley, Quart. Jour. Microsc. Sci., 1875.

monostomatous (mon-'ō-stōm-'ā-tus), a. [NL., monostomatus (cf. Gr. μονόστομος), < Gr. μῶνος, single, + στόμα, the mouth.] Having a single mouth, pore, or stoma; of or pertaining to the Monostomata: opposed to polystomatous.

Monostomes (mon-'ō-stō-'mē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] An order of aculephs, or discophoran Hydroids, with single central mouth and one polypite. They are free oceanic jelly-fishes, some of them of enormous size, the disk 6 or 7 feet in diameter, and the tentacles trailing to feet. The leading forms are Pelagia, Cyanea, and Aurelia, each of them type of a family. Also Monostoma, Monostoma, Monostomata, and Pelagada.

monostomean (mon-'ō-stō-'mē-an), a. and n. [Gr. Monostoma + -an.] 1. A. Pertaining to the Monostomes, or having their characters.

II. n. A jelly-fish of the order Monostomata.

Monostomidæ (mon-'ō-stō-'mī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monostomum + -idæ.] A family of digenous parasite worms of the order Trematoda, represented by the genus Monostomum.

Monostomum (mō-'nōs-'tō-mum), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] A genus of flukes or trematoid worms, typical of the family Monostomidæ, of an oval elongated form, with only one sucker which surrounds the mouth, a strong pharynx, and the sexual openings near the anterior end of the body. Several species of these parasites are named, as M. nudabile, which is viviparous and infests birds; M. bipartitum, from the gills of fishes; M. lentia, found in the crystalline lens of the human eye. Also called Monostoma. See cuts under ceraria.

monostrophæ (mō-'nōs-'trō-fē), n. [LL. monostrophus, < Gr. μονόστροφος, consisting of a single kind of strophe, < μῶνος, single, + στροφή, a strophe: see strophe.] In pros., a poem in which all the strophes or stanzas are of the same metrical form.

monostrophic (mon-'ō-strof-'īk), a. [Gr. μονόστροφος, < μῶνος, single, consisting of a single kind of strophe: see monostrophe.] In pros., consisting of a succession of systems or strophes all of which are of the same metrical form; of or pertaining to such a succession of systems. Monostrophic composition is a subdivision of antistrophic composition, and is opposed to composition by pericopes. Most English poems which are composed in strophes or stanzas are monostrophic (as, for instance, our ordinary ballads, short- and long-meter hymns, etc.).—composition by pericope being limited to imitations of the Greek dramatist and lyric poets. See systematic.

monostyle (mon-'ō-stīl'), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + *E. style*¹.] In arch., having the same style of architecture throughout. Oxford Glossary.

monostyle (mon-'ō-stīl'), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + στυλος, pillar: see *style*².] In arch., having or consisting of a single shaft: applied to medieval pillars, in contradistinction to polystyle.

monostylous (mon-'ō-stī-lus), a. [As monostyle + -ous.] In bot., having only one style.

monosy (mon-'ō-sī), a. [NL. (Morren, 1852), < Gr. μῶνος, singleness, < μῶνος, make single, < μῶνος, single: see monad.] In bot., an abnormal condition in which organs that are ordinarily entire, or more or less united, have become split or disunited, as when a normally entire leaf becomes lobed or partite. It includes two kinds of abnormal isolation—(a) when the separation is congenital (adenosy), and (b) when it is the result of the separation of parts previously joined (schizosy).

monosyllabic (mon-'ō-sī-lab-'īk), a. [= F. monosyllabique = Sp. monosilábico = Fr. monosyllabique (cf. Sp. monosilabo = It. monosilabo, adj.), < LL. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύνδακτος, of one syllable, monosyllable: see monosyllable.] 1. Consisting of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic word.—2. Consisting of words of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic verse.—Monosyllabic echo, an echo of such kind that separate monosyllables are distinctly heard. This requires that the reflecting surface be about 112 feet from the observer. See echo.

monosyllabically (mon-'ō-sī-lab-'ī-kī-lī), adv. In monosyllables; with the use of monosyllables. monosyllabism (mon-'ō-sī-lab-'ī-zm), n. [= F. monosyllabisme; as monosyllab(e) + -ism.] 1. A predominance of monosyllables; the exclusive use of monosyllables: as, the monosyllabism of Chinese.—2. The state of being monosyllabic; the character of a monosyllable.

monosyllable (mon-'ō-sī-lab-'īl), n. [For "monosyllable" (as syllable for "syllable") = F. monosyllabe = Sp. monosilabo = Fr. monosyllabo = It. monosillabo, a monosyllable, < LL. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύνδακτος, of one syllable, < μῶνος, single, + σύνδακτις, syllable: see syllable.] A word of one syllable.

She dealt in nothing but in monosyllables, as if to have spoken words of greater length would have cracked her voice. Dexter, Lanthorne and Candle-Light, I.

monosyllable (mon-'ō-sī-lab-'īl), r. t.; pret. and pp. monosyllabled, ppr. monosyllabing. [monosyllable, n.] To express in or reduce to one syllable. [Itare.]

Nine tallors, if rightly spelled.
Into one man are monosyllabled. Claudian.

monosyllolism (mon-'ō-sī-lŏ-'jī-zm), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + E. syllogism.] A syllogism viewed as an isolated and independent whole.

monosyllolistic (mon-'ō-sī-lŏ-'jī-'tīk), a. [Gr. monosyllolism + -istic.] Consisting of a single syllogism.—Monosyllolistic proof. See proof.

monosymmetric (mon-'ō-sī-met-'īk), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + E. symmetry + -ic.] In crystal, noting that system of crystallization in which there is but one plane of symmetry, the clinodiagonal plane: same as monoclinic.

monosymmetrical (mon-'ō-sī-met-'ī-kāl), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + E. symmetric + -al.] In bot., applied to flowers or other structures which can be bisected into similar halves in only one plane: synonymous with zygomorphous.

monota (mō-'nō-'tā), n.; pl. monota (-tē). [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + ὄτα (ōta), ear, handle: see earl.] A one-handed vase.

Amphora with small monota beside it.
B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 521.

monotelephone (mon-'ō-tel-'ē-fŏn), n. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + E. telephone.] A telephone adapted for transmitting or receiving a sound of definite pitch or frequency of vibration.

monotelephonic (mon-'ō-tel-'ē-fŏn-'īk), a. [As monotelephone + -ic.] Adapted for transmitting one note or sound of definite pitch.

monotessaron (mon-'ō-tēs-'ā-rŏn), n.; pl. monotessara (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + τέσσαρες four.] A Scriptural narrative prepared from a collation of the four evangelists; a harmony of the four gospels; a diatessaron.

monothalamian (mon-'ō-thal-'ā-mi-an), a. and n. [Gr. monothalamus + -ian.] Same as monothalamian.

Monothalamia (mon-'ō-thā-lā-'mī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. A division of reticulate amoebiform protozoans, or Foraminifera, containing those whose test is single-chambered: opposed to Polythalamia. The term does not indicate any natural division of the foraminifera. See cut under Foraminifera.—2. In conch., a division of Cephalopoda, containing those cephalopoda whose shell is single-chambered, as the genus Argonauta. Lamarck.

monothalamian (mon-'ō-thā-lā-'mī-an), a. and n. [Gr. Monothalamia + -an.] 1. A. Single-chambered; unilocular; having but one compartment: especially applied to Foraminifera of this character, in distinction from polythalamian. See cut under Foraminifera.

II. n. An organism whose test or shell is unilocular or monothalamous: said of cephalopods, and especially of foraminifera.

Also monothalamus. monothalamous (mon-'ō-thal-'ā-mus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. In bot., single-chambered; having but one compartment; unilocular: applied to galls upon plants, and also rarely (as by Tuckerman) to the apothecia of certain lichens.—2. In entom., having but one cavity: applied to the nests or galls of insects when they have only a single chamber.

monothecal (mon-'ō-thē-'kāl), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + θήκη, case, receptacle: see theca.] In bot., having only one loculant or cell of the pericarp.

monothelism (mon-'ō-thē-'izm), n. [= F. monothélisme = Sp. monotelismo = Fr. monothélisme =

II. n. A wheel-animalcule whose wheel is single and undivided; any member of the Monotrocha.

monotrochous (mō-not'ō-kūn), a. [As Monotrocha + -ous.] Same as monotrochal.

Monotropa (mō-not'ō-pi), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), so called in allusion to the nodding flowers, which are 'turned to one side'; < Gr. μῶνος, single, + τροπή, turn. Cf. Gr. μωνοτροπία, of one kind, living alone, < μῶνος, single, + τροπή, a turn, way, kind, < τροπή, turn.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, the type of the natural order Monotropaceae, characterized by a solitary flower with separate petals. But one species is known, M. uniflora, of North America, Japan, and the Himalayas, the Indian pipe, corpse-plant, or ice-plant. This plant is a root-parasite or feeds on vegetable mold; it is fleshy, white or pinkish throughout, its simple clustered stems 6 or 10 inches high, clad with small scales, the nodding flower with about ten similar sepals and petals. The pine-apple or bird's nest, often classed as M. hypopitys, is now referred to a separate genus, Hypopitys (see bird's nest, 1 (b), and begonia-drops).

Flowering Plant of Indian pipe (Monotropa uniflora)
a, stem, b, fruit

Monotropaceae (mō-n'ō-trō-pā'si-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Monotropa + -aceae.] Same as Monotropaea.

Monotropes (mō-n'ō-trō'pē-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), < Monotropa + -es.] A natural order of dicotyledonous plants of the cohort Ericales, typified by the genus Monotropa. It is composed of leafless parasite herbs, with a four- to six-celled superior ovary. Nine genera are known, with 10 or 12 species, natives of woods in the north temperate zone, especially in America. They have short, scaly, unbranched stems, and no green color, but are tawny, white, or reddish.

monotropic (mō-n'ō-trō'pik), a. [< Gr. μωνοτροπός, of one kind; see Monotropa.] Same as monodromic.

monotypal (mō-n'ō-tī-pāl), a. [< monotype + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monotype (mō-n'ō-tīp), n. and a. [= F. monotype, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + τύπος, type; see type.] I. n. 1. The only, single, or sole type, as a species single in its genus, a genus in its family, etc.; a typical representative alone of its kind. — 2. A print from a metal plate on which a picture is painted, as in oil-color or printers' ink. Only one proof can be made, since the picture is transferred to the paper.

We do not remember to have seen the word monotype before, nor have we seen a public exhibition of examples of this curious combination of painting and printing, but the process, or something like it, is one well known among artists, and consists of taking off, on a sheet of wet paper, by means of a press, a transfer of a picture simply painted on a polished plate of metal. The Academy, No. 891, p. 384.

II. a. Monotypic.

monotypic (mō-n'ō-tīp'ik), a. [< monotype + -ic.] 1. Having but one type; consisting of a single representative; represented by a monotype, as a genus of one species, a family of one genus, etc. — 2. Being a monotype; alone representing a given group, as a species single in its genus.

Also monotypal and monotypical.

monotypical (mō-n'ō-tīp'ī-kāl), a. [< monotypic + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monovalence (mō-nōv'ā-lēns), n. [< monovalent + -ce.] The character of being monovalent.

monovalency (mō-nōv'ā-lēn-si), n. Same as monovalence.

monovalent (mō-nōv'ā-lēnt), a. [< Gr. μῶνος, single, + l. valent (t-s), ppr. of valere, be strong.] In chem., having a valence equal to that of hydrogen, represented by unity. Also, and more properly, called univalent.

monoxid, monoxide (mō-nōk'sīd, -sīd or -sīd), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. oxid.] An oxid containing a single oxygen atom combined either with two univalent atoms or with one bivalent atom. The term is used where several oxids of the same element are to be distinguished, as carbon monoxid, (CO), to be distinguished from carbon dioxid or carbonic acid, CO₂.

monoxyle (mō-nōk'sīl), n. [< Gr. μονόξυλον; see monoxylon.] Same as monoxylon. R. F. Burton, tr. Arabian Nights, IV. 169, note.

monoxylon (mō-nōk'sī-lon), n. [< LGr. μονόξυλον, neut. of μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk; see monoxylous.] 1. A canoe or boat made from one piece of timber. — 2. In the Ionian Islands, a boat propelled by one oar. Admiral Smythe.

monoxylous (mō-nōk'sī-lus), a. [= F. monoxyle, < l. monoxylon, < Gr. μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk (neut. μονόξυλος, see πῆλον, a boat so made), also made of wood only, < μῶνος, single, only, + ξύλον, wood, a piece of wood.] Formed of a single piece of wood. Dr. Wilson.

Monozoa (mō-n'ō-zō'), n. pl. Same as Monocytaria.

monozoan (mō-n'ō-zō'an), a. [As monozo (ic) + -an.] Same as monozoic or monocytharian.

monozoic (mō-n'ō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. μῶνος, single, + ζῷον, an animal.] In zool., having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian.

Monozonia (mō-n'ō-zō'nī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + ζώνη, a belt, girdle.] A division of myriapods. Brandt.

Monroe doctrine. See doctrine.

Monro's foramen. See foramen of Monro, under foramen.

mons (monz), n.; pl. montes (mon'tēz). [L., a mount.] In anat., the mons Veneris. — Mons Veneris, the mount of Venus, the prominence over the pubic symphysis of the human female, cushioned with fat and covered with hair.

Mons. An abbreviation of the French Monseigneur.

monseigneur (mōn-si-nyēr'), n. [F. (= Sp. monseñor = Pg. monseñor or lt. monsignore, after F.), lit. my lord, < mon (< l. meus, acc. meum), my, + seigneur, < l. senior, elder, ML. lord; see senior, signior, señor, etc. Cf. monsignor and monseur.] A French title of honor, equivalent to 'my lord,' given to princes, bishops, and other dignitaries of the church or court.

At different times the meaning has been considerably extended. Abbreviated Mgr.

Monseigneur, one of the great lords in power at the Court, held his forthrightly reception in his grand hotel in Paris. De Kena, Tale of Two Cities, II. 7.

monsieur (F. pron. mō-si-yē'), n.; pl. messieurs (F. pron. mē-si-yē'). [Formerly partly Anglicized as monsieur, monseigneur, monseuer; = Sp. monseñor = lt. monseñor, < F. monseur, OF. monseur (also messire, messire = lt. messire, orig. 'my sir,' i. e. my lord), < mon, < l. meus, acc. meum, my, + señor, OF. sire, etc. (> E. sir, contr. of OF. seigneur, signior, etc., lord, lit. 'elder'; see sir, señor, signior, señor, senior. Cf. monseigneur, of which monsieur is, on analysis, a contracted form.) 1. Literally, my lord; sir; the common title of courtesy in France, answering to the English Mr. Abbreviated M., Mons.; plural M.M., Messrs.

For Monseigneur Malvolio, let me alone with him. Shak., T. N., II. 3. 144.

Did you ever know a Frenchman that could not take an affront? I warrant monseigneur knows what he is about, don't you, monseigneur? Mac Rury, Evelina, xiv.

2. A title given to the eldest brother of the King of France.

Oh let the King, let Monseigneur and the Sovereign That doth Navarra Spain a wronged Scepter govern, He all by all, their Countries Fathers cleave! Spectator, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Handy Crafts.

3. A Frenchman; vulgarly and humorously monseuer.

A shoeless soldier there a man might meet Leading his monseuer by the arms fast bound. Drayton, Battle of Agincourt.

Now the Baron was as unlike the traditional Monseuer of English songs, plays, and satires as a man could well be. W. Collins, Lady of Elms with Orange.

4. A gentleman; said of a Frenchman.

There is a Frenchman, his companion one An eminent monseuer. Shak., Cymbeline, I. 6. 65.

Monsieur de Paris, a euhemistic title given in France to the public executioner.

At the gallows and the wheel the axe was a rarity — Monsieur de Paris, as it was the episcopal mode among his brother Professors of the provinces, Monsieur de Paris and the rest, to call him, presided. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, II. 7.

monsignor (mōn-sē-nyor), n. [< lt. monsignor, monsignore; see monseigneur.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a title conferred upon prelates, and upon the dignitaries of the papal court and household. Also, in the fuller Italian form, monsignore (plural monsignori). Abbreviated Mgr.

It seemed the whole court of Rome was there — monsignori and prelates without end. Disraeli, Lothar, Ivi.

The master of the ceremonies, Monsignor Faber, advances up the Chapel. J. R. Shorthouse, John Ingelman, xix.

Mons Minalus. [NL.: l. mons, mount; Mentalus, < Gr. Μαίνωλος, Μαίνωλος, a range of mountains in Arcadia.] A constellation, the mountain Mentalus, formed of a few stars in the feet of Boötes. It was introduced in 1800, in a posthumous work of Hevelius. The name (that of a mountain in Arcadia) is connected with the myth of Arcas and his mother, personages identified with the Great Bear and Boötes by the Greeks. The constellation is not now admitted.

Mons Mensæ. [L., named after Table Rock at the Cape of Good Hope: mons, mount; mensæ, gen. of mensa, table.] A constellation introduced by Lacaille in 1752, between the south poles of the equator and the ecliptic. Its brightest star is of the fifth magnitude.

monsoon (mon-sūn'), n. [Formerly also monson; cf. Sw. monsoon = Dan. monsun (< E.), Sw. monsson (< F.); F. monson, monçon, now monsson = Sp. monzon = Pg. monção = lt. monesone, a monsoon; with accom. Rom. term., < Malay mūsīn, monsoon, season, year, = Hind. mausim, time, season, < Ar. mausim, a time, season, < masama, mark.] 1. A wind occurring in the alternation of the trade-winds in India and the north Indian ocean. During the half-year from April to October the regular northeast trade-winds are reversed, and, with occasional interruptions, the wind blows almost a steady gale from the southwest. In some places the change of the monsoons is attended with calms; in others with variable winds; and in others, as in China, with storms and much rain. These tempests are called the breaking up of the monsoon. The reversed trade-wind is termed the summer, southwest, or wet monsoon, and the trade wind is termed the winter, northeast, or dry monsoon.

The times of seasonable winds called Monsons, wherein the ships depart from place to place in the East Indies. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 278.

They often lose the benefit of their monsons, and much more easily other winds, and frequently their voyage. Boyle, Works, III. 771.

The summer monsoon is a much stronger current than its winter correlative; and in India this fact is recognized in popular language, since it is often spoken of distinctively as "the monsoon," the claim of the winter monsoon to the same designation being for the moment tacitly ignored. H. F. Blanford.

2. Any of the winds that have annual alternations of direction and velocity, arising from differences of temperature between continents or islands and the surrounding ocean.

All the great monsoons are found in countries and on oceans adjacent to high mountain ranges. W. Ferrel.

On the Brazilian coast, about and to the south of the tropic, there is so much regularity in the alternation of winds, although but for a few points, that their two prevailing currents, from south-east to north-east, are often called monsoons. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 145.

monsoopal (mōn-sū-pāl), a. [< monsoon + -al.] Of or relating to monsoons; of regular or periodical occurrence; said of winds.

monster (mon'stēr), n. and a. [ME. monstre, monstre, < OF. monstre, F. monstre = Sp. monstruo = Pg. monstro = lt. monstrum, monstrum, a divine omen, esp. one indicating misfortune, an evil omen, a portent, prodigy, wonder, monster. Cf. monere, warn; see monish. Cf. monster, c., muyster, monstration, etc.] I. n. 1. Anything extraordinary, supernatural, or wonderful; a thing to be wondered at; a prodigy.

For wende I never by possibillitee That swich a monstre or mervellie mighte be. Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, I. 610.

2. A fabulous animal of grotesque or chimerical figure and often of huge size, compounded of human and brute shape, or of the shapes of various brutes, as the sagittary, centaur, sphinx, mermaid, minotaur, griffin, mantichore, etc.

This is some monster of the tale. . . . Four legs and two voices: a most delicate monster. Shak., Tempest, II. 2. 84.

Then Enoch traded for himself, and bought Quaint monsters for the market of those times, A gilded dragon, also, for the babies. Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

3. Any very large animal; anything unusually large of its kind.

Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam-fountains in the sea. Tennyson, Lotus-Eaters, Choric Song.

4. An animal or a plant of abnormal form or structure; any living monstrosity. The deviation consists sometimes in an excess, sometimes in a deficiency, of certain organs or parts; sometimes in a general or particular malformation, and sometimes in the presence of organs or parts not belonging to the sex or species. The body of scientific doctrine or knowledge of such creatures is known as teratology.

5. A person regarded with horror because of his moral deformity, or his propensity to commit revolting or unnatural crimes.

He cannot be such a monster. Shak., Lear, I. 2. 100.

6. Something unnatural and horrible.

By heaven, he cannot see
As if there were some wonder in his thought.
Too hideous to be shown. Shak., Othello, III. 2. 107.

71. An example; a pattern.

Trewly she Was his choicest patron of beauty
And chose example of all his works
And monster.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 912.

Gila monster. [So called from the Gila river in Arizona.] A large lizard, Holodermis suspectum, of the family Holodermidae, of clumsy figure and most repulsive aspect, notable as the only member of the order Lacertidae known to be venomous, except the very similar H. horridum, the crust-lizard, found in Mexico. The name is also given to H. horridum.—Many-headed monster. See many-headed.

II. a. Of inordinate size or numbers: as, a monster gun; a monster meeting.

monster (mon'ster), v. t. [< ME. monstren, < OF. monstrier, < L. monstrare, show: see monstrator, n., and monish. Cf. muster, v.] 1. To exhibit; show; muster. See muster. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.].—2. To make monstrous; exaggerate or magnify extravagantly.

Men. Pray now, sit down.
Cor. I had rather have one scratch my head 't the sun
When the alarm were struck, than idly sit
To hear my nothings monster'd. Shak., Cor., II. 2. 81.

Monstera (mon'ste-rä), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763); origin unknown.] A genus of monocotyledonous climbing shrubs of the natural order Araceae, type of the tribe Monsteroideae and the subtribe Monstereae, characterized by four ovules in a two-celled ovary. There are 12 species, natives of tropical America. They have large firm two-ranked leaves, often with a row of large elliptical holes. Their flowers are small, without calyx or corolla, crowded upon a spathe, with a boat-shaped spathe, often yellow. The succulent fruit of coherent berries is, in the case of the Mexican M. deltoidea, an article of food. Several species are cultivated under glass for their singular foliage.

Monstereae (mon-stê-rê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1887), < Monstera + -eae.] A subtribe of plants of the order Araceae, embracing 9 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 59 species, confined to tropical regions.

monster-master (mon'ster-mäs'tér), n. A tamer of brutes. [Rare.]

This monster master stout (Nimrod).
This Hercules, this hammer III.
Splendor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., Babylon.

Monsteroideae (mon-stê-roï-dê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1887), < Monstera + -oideae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Araceae (Araceae). It embraces the subtribes Monstereae, Spathiphyllaeae, and Synplocarpaeae, with 16 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 61 species.

monster-ship (mon'ster-ship), n. [< monster + -ship.] The state of being a monster: in the quotation used humorously as a title.

Caed. It (humor) is a gentleman-like monster.
Caed. I'll name on it; humor, earnest, I know you not, begone.
Let who will make hungry goals for your monster ship, it shall not be L. B. Jonson, Every Man (in his humor), III. 2.

monstrance (mon'strance), n. [< OF. monstrance = Lat. monstrantia, a monstrantia, < L. monstrare (t), pp. of Monstrance—French work of the end of the 14th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.") monstrary, show: see monster, v., monstrator, and cf. monstrantia. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., originally, any receptacle in which sacred relics were held up to view; after the fourteenth century, restricted to the transparent or glass-faced shrine in which the consecrated host is presented for the adoration of the people, either while being carried in procession or when exposed on the altar. It is placed in a stand, generally made of precious metal, and sometimes richly jeweled. See lunette, II. Also called expositorium, ostensorium, monstrance, and theotoca.

monstration (mon-strä'shon), n. [< L. monstratio(n)-, a showing, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show, point out, indicate, explain, indict, also advise: see monster, v.] A showing; demonstration; proof.

The blood burst incontinent out of the nose of the dead king at the burning of his sonne, geuing thereby as a certaine monstration howe he was the author of his death. Grafton, Hen. II., an. 28.

monstrator (mon'strä-tor), n. [< L. monstrator, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show: see monstratio(n).] An exhibitor; a demonstrator. [Rare.] This exhibition a university ought to supply, and at the same time, as a necessary concomitant, a competent monstrator. Sir W. Hamilton.

monstricide (mon'stri-sid), n. [< L. monstrem, a monster, + -idium, < cadere, kill.] The slaughter of a monster. [Humorous.] mont-de-piété (mōn'dē-pe-a-tē), n. [F., = Sp. monte de piedad, < It. monte di pietà, lit. 'fund of pity' (cf. equiv. Sp. monte pio, 'pious fund'), < L. mon(t)-s, hill, heap, Mt. also pile of money, fund, bank; de, of; pieta(t)-s, piety, Mt. compassion, pity; see mount, de, piety, pity.] An institution established by public authority for lending money on the pledge of goods, at a reasonable rate of interest. These establishments originated in Italy in the fifteenth century, the object in founding them being to counteract the exorbitantly usurious practices of the Jews. The funds, together with suitable warehouses and other accommodations, are managed by directors, and the goods pledged are sold if the money lent on them is not returned by the proper time.

monte (mon'tē), n. [< Sp. mont, a hill, mountain, wood, heap, a gambling-game, < L. mons (mont-), a hill, mountain; see mount.] 1. A tract more or less thickly covered with shrubby vegetation or scanty forests; a forest. In South America, and especially in the northern part, the word monte is used to designate more or less scantily forested regions or narrow belts of forest vegetation, while montaña is applied to broad, densely forested areas. In Mexico and California monte more generally has the signification of 'forest.'

Less than a league above there is [in New Granada] a spot destitute of trees. All such are called llano: plain—whether they be flat or hilly; and all land covered with thickets is called monte if it be but a few miles through, and montaña if more. L. F. Holton, New Granada, p. 434.

The montes of South and Central Uruguay form narrow fringes to the larger streams, and rarely exceed a few hundred yards in width. Seen from distant higher ground, they resemble rivers of verdure meandering through the bare campos, from which they are sharply defined. The reason being that the wood only grows where it is liable to inundation. Encyc. Brit., IX. 406.

2. A favorite Spanish and Spanish-American gambling-game, played with the Spanish pack of forty cards. The players bet on certain cards of a layout, and win or lose according as others drawn from the pack do or do not match with these. Monte was the most popular of the gambling-games of California in the early times of the gold discoveries. Three-card monte, a gambling-game, of Mexican origin, played with three cards, of which one is usually a court-card. By skillful manipulation, the cards are so thrown on the table, face down, as to deceive the eye of the manipulator's opponent, who bets on the position of one of the cards, usually the court-card.

monte-bank (mon'tē-bangk), n. A gaming-table or an establishment where monte is played; also, the bank or pile of money usually placed in front of the dealer, and used in paying the stakes.

movable rim, and decorated with flutings and a scalloped edge. It was also used for cooling and carrying wine-glasses.

Now things produce new words, and thus Monteth has by one vessel saved his name from Death. Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 185.

Silver elaters could not have been common or often put to the baser use (finishing forks and spoons during dinner); but when they were discarded from the table, the more interesting monteth, with its movable rim, tall punch glasses, lemon strainer, and ladle, took their place. N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 250.

2. [Appar. of different origin from the above, but from the same surname.] A kind of cotton handkerchief having white spots on a colored ground, the spots being produced by a chemical which discharges the color. Diet. Needlework.

monte-jus (F. pron. mōnt'zhū), n. [F., < monter, raise, + jus, juice; see mount, r., and juice.]

In sugar-manuf., a force-pump by which the juice from the cane-mill is raised to the clarifiers on a story above. It consists of a vessel with a well sunk in the bottom and having three valves, one by which the juice is received, another by which it is discharged, and a third by which steam is admitted. The steam, entering above the surface of the juice, forces it up through the delivery-pipe to the clarifiers. The steam then condenses, and leaves a vacuum, and the operation of alternately filling and ejecting continues. E. H. Knight.

Monte-jus.

montem (mon'tēm), n. [Short for L. processus ad montem, going to the hill; processus, a going forward, orig. pp. of procedere, go forward (see proceed); ad, to, toward; montem, acc. of mons, a hill, mount; see mount.] The name given to an ancient English custom, prevalent among the scholars of Eton till 1847, which consisted in their proceeding every third year on Whit-Thuesday to a tumulus or mound near the Bath road, and exacting "money for salt," as it was called, from all persons present, or passers-by. The sum so collected was given to the captain, or senior scholar, and was intended to assist in defraying the expenses of his residence at the university. The "salt-money" has been known to reach nearly £1,000.

Montenegrin, Montenegrine (mon-te-neg'-rin), a. and n. [< Montenegro (see def.).] An It. translation of Serv. Crna Gora, Black Mountain (Serv. crn, black, gora, mountain); < monte, < L. mons (mont-), mountain, + negro, negro, < L. niger, black; see mount and negro.] I. a. Relating to Montenegro, a small country of Europe, east of the Adriatic, nearly surrounded by Austrian and Turkish territory, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Montenegro. The Montenegrins are of Serbian race, and speak a dialect of that language.—2. [It.] An outer garment for women, the form of which was taken from some Eastern military costumes, close-fitting, and ornamented with braid-work and embroidery.

month (munth), n. [Early mod. E. moneth; < ME. month, moneth, < AS. mōnath, mōnath (in inflection syncopeated mōnth-) = OFries. mōnath, mōnad, mōnd = D. maand = MLG. mānet, I.G. maand = OHG. mānōt, MHG. mānōt, mānet; G. monat = lecl. mānuōth = Sw. mānad = Dan. måned = Goth. mēnaths, a month; cf. Gael. mios, Ir. mios, Old Ir. mī (gen. mīo) = W. mis = Obulg. mienet = Serv. mjesec = Bohem. mesic = Pol. mesiac = Russ. mesyats = Lith. mėnuo = Latv. mēnes = L. mensis = Gr. mēnē (for mēnē*), month, = Skt. māsa (for māsa*, mōsa*), month; names derived from or connected with the name for 'moon,' AS. mōna = Goth. mēna = Gr. mēnē, etc.; but the phonetic relations are not entirely clear; see moon.] 1. Originally, the interval from one new moon to the next, called specifically a lunar, synodical, or illuminative month. This seldom varies more than a quarter of a day from its mean value, which is 29.5306 days, or 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, and 27 seconds. There are, besides, other periods of the moon which are termed months by astronomers. These are—(a) The anomalistic month, or mean period of the revolution of the moon from one perigee to the next. It is 27 days, 13 hours, 18 minutes, 57.4 seconds. (b) The sidereal month, or mean period required by the moon to make a circuit among the stars: it is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 11.5 seconds. (c) The tropical month, or the mean period of the moon's passing through 360 degrees of longitude, as from one vernal equinox to the next: it differs from the sidereal month only by an amount corresponding to the monthly precession of the equinoxes, and is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 4.7 seconds. (d) The nodical or draconitic month, which is the mean time between two successive passages by the moon through its rising node: it is 27 days, 6 hours, 6 minutes, and 36 seconds.

2. One twelfth part of a tropical year, or 30 days, 10 hours, 29 minutes, 3.8 seconds: called specifically a solar month.—3. One of the twelve parts into which the calendar year is arbitrarily divided: called specifically a calendar month. The calendar months are January, 31 days; February, 28 (except in leap-year, when it has 29); March, 31; April, 30; May, 31; June, 30; July, 31; August, 31; September, 30; October, 31; November, 30; December, 31.

4. At common law and in equity, month has been understood to mean a lunar month, which is assumed to be 28 days, except when the contrary appears, and except when used of mercantile transactions, such as negotiable paper, etc. In ecclesiastical law, and now in all cases throughout the United States generally, its legal meaning is 'a calendar month,' except when the contrary appears. For the purpose of calculating interest, a month is generally considered the twelfth part of a year, and as equivalent to 30 days.

Et. pl. Same as meneses. Minshew; Cotgrave.

monument (mon'ū-mēnt), n. [Formerly also moniment; < ME. monument, monymēt, < OF. (and F.) monument = Sp. Pg. It. monumento, < L. monumentum, monimentum, that which calls a thing to mind, a memorial, < monere, remind; see monish.] 1. Anything by which the memory of a person, a period, or an event is preserved or perpetuated; hence, any conspicuous, permanent, or splendid building, as a medieval cathedral, or any work of art or industry constituting a memorial of the past; a memorial.

Our bruised arms hung up for monuments.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 1. 6.

I know of no such thing as an Indian monument, for I would not honour with that name arrow points, stone hatchets, stone pipes, and half-shaven images.
Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (1787), p. 156.

2. Specifically, a pile, pillar, or other structure erected expressly in memory of events, actions, or persons.

To fill with worm-holes stately monuments.
Shak., Lucio, I. 1. 646.

I would . . . pile up every stone
Of lustre from the brook, in memory
Of monument to ages.
Milton, P. L., xl. 826.

3. A stone shaft, or a structure of stone or other enduring material, erected over a grave in memory of the dead. — 4. A burial-vault; a tomb.

Lord, if thou be he, shew me the monument that I put the in.
Joseph of Arimathea (E. K. T. S.), p. 23.

Make the bridal bed
In that dim monument where Tybalt lies.
Shak., R. and J., III. 2. 208.

5. Any enduring evidence or example; a singular or notable instance.

I do much reverence the memory of so famous a man, that with the monuments of his wit . . . hath much benefited the Common-wealth of good letters.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 100.

The last two years have seen the production of Mr. Freeman's Norman Conquest, which . . . is a monument of critical erudition and genius.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 57.

6. In surveying and the law of conveyancing, any object, natural or artificial, fixed in the soil and referred to in a deed or other document as a means of ascertaining the location of a tract of land or any part of its boundaries. In this sense the word is applied to such objects as trees, river-banks, and ditches; and its importance is in the general rule that in case of discrepancy courses or distances mentioned in a description must give way so far as necessary to conform to a monument.

7. A treatise.

When I had done refuting it, I found in Barret's Alvaric, quibik is a dictionary Anglo-latinum, that Sr. Thomas Smith, a man of use less worth than learning, Secretary to Queen Elizabeth, had left a learned and judicious monument on the same subject.

A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), Bod., p. 2.

8. Distinctive mark; stamp.

Some others (pieces of gold) were new driven, and distant into great Ingowa and to wedges square;
Some in round plates withouten monument.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 6.

monument (mon'ū-mēnt), v. t. [< monument, n.] 1. To erect a monument in memory of.

The ecclesiastical dignitaries bury themselves and monument themselves (in the cathedral) to the exclusion of almost everybody else in those latter times.

Hawthorne, English Note-Books, June 17, 1866.

2. To place monuments on; adorn with monuments; as, a region monumented with glorious deeds.

monumental (mon'ū-men'tal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. monumental, < L. monumentalis, of or belonging to a monument, < monumentum, a monument; see monument.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or connected with a monument or monuments; as, a monumental inscription.

Some have amused the dull and years of life . . .
With schemes of monumental fame and sought
By pyramids and mausolean pomp Short-lived themselves, to immortalize their bones.
Conger, Task, v. 182.

2. Belonging to a tomb.

Softly may he be possessed
Of his monumental rest.
Crusoe.

3. Serving as a monument or as material for a monument; memorial; preserving memory; as, a monumental pillar.

And monumental brass this record bears,
"These are . . . ah no! these were the guests!"
Pope, Dunciad, II. 912.

4. Having the character of a monument; resembling a monument.

Me, goddess, bring
To arched walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown, that Sylvan loves,
Of pine, or monumental oak.
Milton, II. Penseroso, l. 128.

5. Conspicuous and permanent; historically prominent; impressive.

Darius himself is, if we may use the expression, a monumental figure in history.
Van Renss., Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 114.

6. Conspicuous as a monument; notable; excessive; amazing; as, monumental impudence. [Colloq.] — Monumental cross. See cross, 2. — Monumental theology, the study of ancient monuments, inscriptions, coins, medals, statues, paintings, architecture, etc., in so far as they throw light upon theology.

II. n. A monumental record; a memorial.

When read Moosalla's monuments must Lie with Aclenus's lofty tomb in dust,
I shall be read, and travelers that come Transport my verses to their fathers' home.
Cotton, tr. of Marial's Epigrams, viii. 2.

monumentality (mon'ū-men-tal'itē), n. [< monumental + -ity.] The state or quality of being monumental; the fact or the degree of serving as a monument.

monumentalization (mon'ū-men'tal-i-zā'shōn), n. [< monumental + -ize + -ation.] The act of making or the state of being monumental; the recording by monuments.

This monumentalization of superhuman contemporary knowledge.
Pease Smith, Pyramid, p. 31.

monumentally (mon'ū-men'tal-ē), adv. 1. By way of memorial; as, the pillar was erected monumentally. — 2. By means of monuments. — 3. In a high degree; as, monumentally tedious.

mony¹ (mon'ī), a. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of many.

mony², n. An obsolete form of money.

-mony. [(a) = F. -monie = Sp. Pg. It. -monia, < L. monia, f., a suffix forming nouns from adjectives, nouns, or verbs, as in acrimonia, sharpness, carminia, a rite, parsimonia, thriftiness, sanctimonia, sacredness, etc. (b) = F. -moine = Sp. Pg. It. -monio, < L. monium, neut., used similarly, as in alimonium, nourishment, matrimonium, marriage, testimonium, evidence, etc.] A suffix in some nouns of Latin origin, as in acrimony, ceremony, parsimony, sanctimony, alimony, matrimony, testimony, etc. See etymology. The suffix is not used as an English formative.

monymēt, n. An obsolete form of monument.

moo¹ (mō), v. i. [Imitative of the lowing of a cow. Cf. *mew*², imitative of the crying of a cat.] 1. To utter the characteristic cry of a cow; low.

I need to smell the grass, and see the dew shining, and hear the pretty sweet cows moaning.
Mrs. Trollope, Michael Armstrong, xxiv. (Davies.)

2. To make a noise like lowing. [Rare.]

The moaning of the waters seemed to deepen, more and more rhythmically, through all the hours of darkness.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 726.

moo² (mō), n. [< *moo*¹, v.] The low of a cow; the act of lowing.

moo², a. and adv. An obsolete form of mo.

moo-cow (mō'kōu), n. A cow. [Childish.]

The moo-cow low'd, and Grizzle neigh'd.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, l. 14. (Nares.)

mood¹ (mōd), n. [< ME. mood, mode, mod, < AE. mōd, mind, heart, soul, spirit, courage, pride, haughtiness, magnificence, zeal, = OH. mōd, mūd = OFries. mod = D. mood = M.G. mōd, mōt, mout, mūt, lūt, mot, mūt, mind, heart, courage, = OHG. muot, MHG. muot, sense, spirit, G. mut, muth, courage, = Icel. móðr, wrath, grief, moodiness, = Sw. Dan. mod, courage, = Goth. mōds, wrath; orig. appar. any strong or excited state of feeling; perhaps, with formative -d, from a root appearing in Gr. μῆδος, endeavor, seek, whence prob. ποδός, muse; see Muse.] 1. Mind; heart.

This is his will after Moyses laws,
That ye shuide bring your helms good,
And after theme here your God to knowe,
And frome your syns to turne your mode.
York Plays, p. 484.

2. Temper of mind; state of the mind as regards passion or feeling; disposition; humor; as, a melancholy mood.

When Fortune, in her shift and change of mood, Spurns down her late beloved. Shak., T. of A., I. 1. 85.

Every landscape fair
As fit for every mood of mind,
(Or gay, or grave, or sweet, or stern, was there Tennyson, Palace of Art.)

By mental moods is ordinarily understood those collective conditions of the mind which are characterized by some fundamental tone, but without any special feelings accompanied by clear consciousness of their inducing causes.

(J. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 529.)

3†. Heat of temper; anger.

Atte lute aslaked was his mood.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 902.

Who, in my mood, I stabb'd unto the heart.

Shak., T. of V., iv. 1. 51.

4†. Zeal; in the phrase with main and mood, with might and main; with a will.

Mist Elyne than was wonder layne . . .

That lik figure of the roole

Honoured that with mayn and made.

Holy Food (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

5. A morbid or fantastic state of mind, as a fit of bad temper, sudden anger, or sullenness; also, absence of mind, or abstraction, generally used in the plural.

Then turn'd Sir Torre, and, being in his moods, Left them.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

6. A state of mind with reference to something to be done or omitted; a more or less capricious state of feeling disposing one to action; commonly in the phrase in the mood; as, many artists work only when they are in the mood.

It should be remembered that the motive power always becomes sluggish in men who too easily admit the supremacy of moods.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., l. 167.

mood² (mūd), n. [A later form of mood¹, which is preferable in both the grammatical and logical uses, though not usual in the latter: see mood¹.] 1. In gram., same as mood¹, 3.

The mood is an affection of the verb serving the variety of utterance. (J. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 30.)

2. In logic, a variety of syllogism depending on the quantity (universal or particular) and quality (affirmative or negative) of the propositions composing it. In the traditional logic the names of the moods (invented by Petrus Hispanus) are: First figure, Barbara, Celarent, Darii, Ferio, Baralipton, Celantio, Dabitis, Fapesmo, Fridescomitum; Second figure, Cesare, Camestres, Festino, Baroco, Third figure, Darapti, Disamis, Datisi, Boarado, Ferison. These names are merely mnemonic, and many of their letters are significant. The vowel a denotes a universal affirmative proposition, e the universal negative, i the particular affirmative, and o the particular negative. By the first syllable is indicated the major premise, by the second the minor, and by the third the conclusion. For example, the name Barbara shows that the first mood of the first figure consists of a-a-a universal affirmative premises leading to a universal affirmative conclusion. The same understanding is to be had in regard to the vowels of the other words. Certain of the consonants also are significant. Thus, all indirect moods designated by a word beginning with b should be reduced to Barbara, the first mood of the first figure; all that are designated by a word beginning with c to the second mood, Celarent; all in d to Darii, the third; and all in f to Ferio, the fourth. Other letters indicate how to reduce indirect to direct moods: thus s signifies that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding is to be simply converted in the reduction; p, that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding should be converted per accidens; m, that the premises should be transposed; that is, the major should be made the minor, and conversely; and c, that the mood designated by the word in which it occurs should be reduced per impossibile whence the verses:

Simplexiter vult s vertit, p vero per accid;
M vult transponit, c per impossibile ducl;
Servat majorem, variatque secundam minorem;
Tertia majorem variat, servatque minorem.

A mood is a lawful placing of propositions in their dewo qualitate or quantitate. (Sir T. Wilson, Art of Logic, fol. 23.)

3. In music, same as mood¹, 7.

Amou they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
To highth of noblest temper heroes old Arming to battle. Milton, P. L., l. 560

Indirect or inverse mood, a mood of indirect syllogism. See indirect.

Did moody Richard range
And made large slaughters where he went.
Warner, Albion's England, vii. 33.

3. Subject to or indulging in moods or humors; hence, peevish; fretful; out of humor; gloomy; sullen; melancholy.

Sweet recreation barr'd, what doth ensue

But moody and dull melancholy?

Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 79.

In a moody humour wait,

While my less dainty comrades bait.

Cowper, Ir. of Horace's Satires, l. 5.

Moody madmen laughing wild

Amid severest war

Gray, Ode on Prospect of Eton College.

4†. Corresponding or adapted to moods or varying states of mind. [Rare.]

Give me some music—music, moody food
Of us that trade in love. Shak., A. and C., II. 5. 1.

moody-hearted (mūd'i-har'ted), a. Melancholy. [Halliwell.] [Prov. Eng.] moody-mad (mūd'i-mad), a. Mad with anger.

Moody mad and desperate stags

Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel.

Shak., I. Hen. VI., iv. 2. 60.

mool (mōl), n. A dialectal variant of mold¹.

By worms they're eaten, in mools they're rotten.

Clark Saunders (Child's Ballads), II. 334.

Or worthy friends raked in the mools, Sad sight to me! Byrns, To the Toothache.

moolah, mooliah (mō'li), n. Same as molla.

moolberry, n. A Middle English form of mullberry.

Moolid (mō'lid), n. [< Ar. maulid, nativity, esp. the nativity of Mohammed.] An Egyptian festival in celebration of the birth of Mohammed and the dawn of Islamism; a birthday.

I have now a cluster of bumps hanging before my door,
In honour of the moolid of a sheikh who is buried near the house in which I am living.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 307.

mooly, mooley (mul'i), a. and n. See muley.

moon¹ (mūn), n. [*< ME. moone, mone, < AS. mōna = OS. mano = OFries. mōna = MD. maene, D. man = MHG. mane, mēn, Li. man = OHG. mano, MHG. mane, mēn, also (with excrecent t, due prob. in part to association with mānet, month) mēnte, mēnde, G. mond = Icel. mēni = Sw. mäne = Dan. manne = Goth. mēna (all mase.), the moon; = Gr. μήνη, the moon, = Lith. mėnė, the moon; cf., with appar. formation s. Obalz. mēnėti, etc., moon, month, L. mensis, month, (Gr. μην (for *mēnē), month (Myn, the Moon-god, L. Lunus, Myn, the Moon-god, L. Luna), Skt. mas (for *māns, *mēns) = Zend mā, > Pers. māh (> Hind. Turk. mäh), moon, month. The relations of these forms to each other, and to the words for 'month' (see month), and their ult. root, are undetermined. The usual explanation is that the moon is the 'measurer' (sc. of time), < √ ma, Skt. mā, measure (whence ult. E. mete and measure). The L. name of the moon (luna) and the L., Gr., and Teut. names for the sun (L. sol = AS. söl, etc.; Gr. ἥλιος; AS. sunne, E. sun, etc.) come from other roots, meaning 'shine.'] 1. A heavenly body which revolves around the earth monthly, accompanying the earth as a satellite in its annual revolution, and shining by the sun's reflected light. Next to the sun, the moon is the most conspicuous and interesting of celestial objects. The rapidity of its motion the variety of its phases, and especially the striking phenomena of eclipses, compelled the attention of the earliest observers; and 'he fact that lunar observations can be made available to determine the longitude has given the theory of the moon's motion the first rank in economic importance, while the mathematical problems involved have proved most interesting and fertile from the scientific point of view. Of all the heavenly bodies (meteors excepted) the moon is nearest to us. Its mean distance is a little more than sixty times the radius of the earth, or 38,000 miles. The dimensions of the moon as compared with those of the earth are far greater than those of any other satellite in proportion to its primary. Its diameter is 2,158 miles (about 0.273 of the earth's equatorial diameter), and its volume, or bulk, is 0.0004, or about one forty-ninth of that of the earth. Its mean density, however (about 3.4 times that of water), is only about three fifths of that of the earth, and its mass about one eightieth. The inclination of its orbit to the ecliptic is 5° 8' 40". It completes its revolution around the earth in an average period of 27 d. 7 h. 43 m. 11.5 s., which constitutes the sidereal month; the ordinary, or synodical, month, from new moon to new moon again, is a little more than 29½ days longer—29 d. 12 h. 44 m. 2.7 s. (See month.) The moon's orbital motion is subject to considerable inequalities, due to the disturbing action of the sun, and the investigation of these inequalities makes up the major part of the "lunar theory." The moon revolves on its axis once in a sidereal month, thus always presenting nearly the same face to the earth—a circumstance which has led to the fallacy of a denial of its rotation. (See rotation.) Its disk appears to the naked eye diversified by dark and bright patches, giving rise to the "man in the moon" of popular fancy (see under man); but on examination with a powerful telescope these are lost sight of and replaced by a crowd of interesting objects, such as mountains and valleys, craters and clefts, on a scale unknown upon the earth: the surface-structure seems to be mainly volcanic, resembling very closely in certain respects, and differing most markedly in others from, that which is characteristic of volcanic regions on the earth's surface. The moon has no clouds, shows no indications of an atmosphere or of the presence of water, and is believed to have a temperature which at its maximum does not rise above the melting-point of ice. See libration.

A Part of the Moon's Surface.

moon¹, r. and s. An obsolete spelling of moan¹. moonack (mō'nak), n. [Also monac; Amer. Ind.] The woodchuck, Arctomys monax. J. Burroughs. See cut under Arctomys. [Southern U. S., as Virginia, etc.]

moonbeam (mōn'bēm), n. A ray of light from the moon.

To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes.

Shak., M. N. D., III. 1. 174.

moonbill (mōn'bil), n. The ringbill or ring-necked scamp-duck, Ethya collaris. G. Trumbull. [South Carolina.]

moon-blasted (mōn'blas'ted), a. Blasted by the influence or supposed influence of the moon.

moon-blind (mōn'blind), a. 1. Dim-sighted; purblind. Scott.—2. Same as moonstruck.

moon-blink (mōn'blingk), n. A temporary evening blindness said to be occasioned by sleeping in the moonshine in tropical climates.

moon-box (mōn'boks), n. A theatrical device for displaying an imitation moon on the stage.

moon-calf (mōn'kalf), n. [= G. mondkalb, a moon-calf, a dolt, a false conception, lit. a person or conception influenced by the moon.] 1. A monster; a deformed creature.

I hid me under the dead moon-calf's gaberdine.

Shak., Tempest, II. 2. 118.

2. A dolt; a stupid fellow.—3. A mole or mass of fleshy matter generated in the uterus; a false conception. Cotgrave.

moon-creeper (mōn-kre'pēr), n. Same as moon-flower, 2.

moon-culminating (mōn'kul'mi-nā-ting), a. In astron., passing the meridian at nearly the same time and on nearly the same parallel of declination as the moon.—Moon-culminating stars, stars which culminate at about the same time and nearly on the same parallel of declination as the moon. They are the stars of which the places are given in the Nautical Almanac (generally four in number for each day) for the days on which the moon can be observed, for use in longitude determinations.

moon-culminations (mōn'kul'mi-nā'shonz), n. pl. In astron., a method of determining the longitude of a place by observing with a transit-instrument the times at which the limb of the moon and certain stars in the same part of the sky culminate, or cross the meridian. The fundamental principle is essentially the same as that involved in the nautical method of "lunar distances." Among the stars the moon's position is utilized to make known the Greenwich time but the transit observations are more easy and accurate than those made with a sextant, and the reductions are more simple. The method has been entirely superseded by the telegraphic method wherever circumstances render the latter practicable.

moon-daisy (mōn'dā'zi), n. The oxeye daisy, Chrysanthemum Leucanthemum.

Broad moon-daisies among the ripe and almost sere grass of midsummer. The Century, XXXVI. 504.

moon-dial (mōn'di'al), n. A dial for showing the hours by the moon.

moon'd (mōnd or mō'ned), a. [< moon + -ed².] 1. Having the moon as symbol; identified with the moon.

And moon'd Ashtaroth, Heaven's queen and mother both.

Milton, Nativity, I. 200.

2. Marked or spotted as with moons.

When with his own'd train
The strutting peacock, yawling 'gainst the rain, Flutters into the Ark, by his shrill cry
Telling the rest the tempest to be nigh.

Dryden, Noah's Flood.

3. Resembling the moon; crescent-shaped.

While thus he spake, the angelic squadron bright Turn'd fiery red, sharpening in moon'd horns
Their phalanx. Milton, P. L., IV. 974.

4. Furnished with a moon; bearing the Turkish symbol of the crescent.

Turbans and scimitars in carnage roll'd,
And their moon'd ensigns torn from every hold.

Mickle, Alameda Hill.

moon'er (mō'pēr), n. One who moons; one who wanders or gazes idly or moodily about, as if moonstruck. Dickens. [Colloq.]

moonet (mō'net), n. [< moon + -et.] A little moon; a satellite.

The moonet about Saturn and Jupiter.

moost, a. A Middle English form of most.

moot (mōt), n. [< ME. moot, mote, mot, mot, < AS. mōt (found only in comp.), usually gemōt, meeting, assembly (witena gemōt, assembly of counselors, parliament: see witena-gemōt), = OS. mōt, mōt = MLat. mote, mōte, Lat. mōte = MLat. mōte = leol. mōt = Goth. "gemōt (in deriv. gemōjan, meet), a meeting (cf. Sw. mōte, Dan. møde = E. meet, n.). Hence moot, c. and meet.] 1. A meeting; a formal assembly. In this sense obsolete, except as used, chiefly in the archaic (Middle English) form moot, in certain historical terms, as folk-moot or folkmote, halmote, etc. See def. 3.
The monks were going to London ward,
There to holde grette mote.
Lyell Grave of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 80).

2. The place of such a meeting.—3. In early Eng. hist., a court formed by assembling the men of the village or town, the hundred, or the kingdom, or their representatives. It exercised political and administrative functions with some judicial powers. Compare vitena-gemōt. See the quotation.

The four or ten villagers who followed the roove of each township to the general muster of the hundred were held to represent the whole body of the township from whence they came. Their voice was its voice, their doing its doing, their pledge its pledge. The hundred-moot, a moot which was made by the gathering of the representatives of the township that lay within its bounds, thus became at once a court of appeal from the moote of each separate village as well as of arbitration in disputes between township and township. The judgment of graver crimes, and of life or death, fell to its share; while it necessarily possessed the same right of law making for the hundred that the village moot possessed for each separate village. And as hundred-moot stood above town-moot, so above the hundred-moot stood the folk-moot, the general muster of the people in arms at once war-host and highest law-court, and general Parliament of the tribe. But whether in folk-moot or hundred-moot, the principle of representation was preserved. In both the constitutional forms, the forms of deliberation and decision, were the same. In each the priests proclaimed alliance, the endorsement of higher blood spoke, groups of freemen from each township stood round, shaking their spears in assent, flashing shields in applause, settling matters in the end by loud shouts of "Aye" or "Nay."
J. R. Green, Hist. of Eng. People, l. l.

4. Dispute; debate; discussion; specifically, in law, an argument on a hypothetical case by way of practice.

The pleadings used in courts and chancery called moots, where . . . a case is appointed to be mooted by certain young men, contending some doubtful controversy.
Sir T. Ryot, The Gleaner, l. 14.

I hard that your Grace, in the disputes of all purposes quherwith, after the example of the wise in former ages, you use to reason your moot.

moraine (mō-rā'n), n. and a. [F. moraine;
cf. It. mora, a heap of stones, < G. dial. (Bav.)
mor, sand and broken stones, debris.] 1. n.
The accumulations of rock and detrital material along the edges of a glacier. In mountains where the glaciers are bordered by cliffs, the materials of which these are composed, being loosened by frost, rain, and gravity, fall upon the ice beneath and gradually conveyed downward, receiving additions as they move.
A simple glacier has ordinarily two such lateral moraines, and when two glaciers meet and unite the two adjacent lateral moraines coalesce and form a medial moraine, and the same thing may be repeated again and again as various lateral glaciers unite themselves with the main ones.
At the point where the glaciers and the detritus of the lateral and medial moraines is thrown upon the ground, and forms a more or less irregular pile of debris, called the terminal moraine.

II. a. Same as morainic.

Thus bodily deeds as tokyne and showyge of morall vertues, without which a soule is not able forto worke godly. Hampole, Prose Treatise (R. E. T. S.), p. 21.

The former properly relates to natural, and the latter to moral philosophy, or civil society.

Bacon, Physical Tables, III, Expt.
In Matters of Religion, Moral Distinctions are more to be regarded than Intellectual. Stillington, Sermons, III, vi.

Another sort of relation, which is the conformity or disagreement men's voluntary actions have to a rule to which they are referred, and by which they are judged of, . . .
they be called moral relation.

Locke, Human Understanding, II, xviii, 3.

We are bound to note the circumstance that the moral, which at one time coincides with the "ethical," at other times is co-extensive with the "voluntary."

A. Bode, Emotions and Will, p. 220.
Even the feelings which we call moral, on account of their connection with will and desire, often have an indefinite part of them so combined with feelings located in the bodily organism, or so dependent on its functions for their quantity and quality, that a strict separation becomes impossible.

G. T. Laid, Physiol. Psychology, p. 107.
Kant says that the end of Self-love, our own happiness, cannot be an end for the Moral Reason; that the force of the reasonable Will, in which Virtue consists, is always exhibited in resistance to natural egoistic impulses.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 347.
When in his self-consciousness he (man) realized that through transgression he had become guilty, doubtless all things about him seemed different, because in his own soul there had been a moral revolution.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV, 646.
War is a moral teacher: opposition to external force is an aid to the highest civic virtues.

Woolsey, Intro. to International Law, § 6.
2. In accord with, or controlled by, the rules of right conduct; opposed to immoral. In this sense moral is often used specifically of conduct in the sexual relation.

The wisest and more morale part of mankind were forced to set up laws and punishments, to keep the generality of mankind in some tolerable order.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 355.
Take a moral act. What is it that constitutes it moral?
Its tendency, at least according to Shaftesbury's system, is to promote the general welfare or the good of mankind.

Forster, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 14.
"What do you mean by a thoroughly moral man?" said
I. "Oh, I suppose every one means the same by that," said Melius, with a slight air of rebuke. "Sir Gavial is an excellent family man—quite blameless there; and so charitable round his place at Tiptop . . . When a man whose business hours, the solid part of every day, are spent in an unscrupulous course of public or private action which has every calculable chance of causing widespread injury and misery, can he be called moral because he comes home to dine with his wife and children and cherishes the happiness of his own hearth, the augury is not good for the use of high ethical and theological disputation."

George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.
3. In a special sense, relating to the private and social duties of men as distinct from civil responsibilities; specifically so used in the Hegelian philosophy.

"When St. Crispin steals leather to make shoes for the poor, that act is moral (moralisch) and wrong (unethischlich)"—a remark which explains Hegel's use of moralisch better than much commentary.

D. G. Ritchie, Mind, XIII, 433.
4. Connected with the perception of right and wrong in conduct, especially when this is regarded as an innate power of the mind; connected with or pertaining to the conscience.
See moral sense, moral law, below.

The development of a high moral sensibility can scarcely fall to bring suffering with it, as the mind recognises the meanness of actual attainment.

J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 160.
The problem of exercising the child's moral feelings is clearly connected with that of forming his moral character.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 168.
5. Capable of distinguishing between right and wrong; hence, bound to conform to what is right; subject to a principle of duty; accountable.

A moral agent is a being that is capable of those actions that have a moral quality, and which can properly be denominated good or evil in a moral sense, virtuous or vicious, commendable or faulty.

Edwards, Freedom of the Will, I, 5.
6. Depending upon considerations of what generally occurs; resting upon grounds of probability; opposed to demonstrative: as, moral evidence; moral arguments. See moral certainty, under certainty.

A moral universality is when the predicate agrees to the greatest part of the particulars which are contained under the subject.

Physical and mathematical certainty may be styled infallible; and moral certainty may be properly styled indubitable.

By that my task, replies a gloomy clerk,
Sworn too to mystery, yet divinely dark;
Whose pious hope aspires to see the day
When moral evidence shall quite decay,
And damas implicit faith, and holy lies,
Prompt to impose, and fond to dignify.

Pope, Dunciad, iv, 402.
7. Of or pertaining to morals.—St. Having a moral; emblematical; allegorical; symbolical.

By my troth, I have no moral meaning; I meant plain holi-thistle.

Shak., Much Ado, III, 4, 80.
A thousand moral paintings I can show
That shall demonstrate those quick blows of Fortune's More pregnant than words.

Shak., T. of A., I, 1, 95.
8. Pertaining to the mind; mental; opposed to physical.

Youth, thou bear'st thy father's face;
Frank nature, rather curious than in haste,
Hath well composed thee. Thy father's moral parts Mayst thou inherit too!

Shak., All's Well, I, 2, 21.
10. Pertaining to the will, or conative element of the soul, as distinguished from the intellect or cognitive part. This refers to the usual pre-Kantian division of the soul.—11. Moralizing.
[Rare.]

France spreads his banners in our noiseless land . . .
Whence thou, a moral fool, sit at still and orest,
"Alack, why does he say?"

Shak., Lear, iv, 2, 28.
Moral cause, a person who incites another to do or not to do something.

Author here is said to be him who, proposing reasons, persuades the principal cause either to or from action;
he is also called the moral cause.

Burton, Cicero, tr. by a Gentleman.

Moral certainty. See certainty.—Moral defect. See moral deficiency.—Moral dependence, evidence, force.
See the nouns.—Moral faculty. Same as moral sense.

Moral good either virtue or a virtuous action, or a pleasure or pain coming from such an action.—Moral goodness. See goodness.—Moral inability. See inability, 2.—Moral insanity. See insanity.—Moral law.

(a) The law of conscience or duty; either a single central principle of right conduct, or the system of rules which should govern conduct. (b) See law.—Moral necessity. See necessity.—Moral philosophy. (a) The philosophy of mind; psychology. (b) Ethics; the science of morality.—Moral sense, a phrase used by Shaftesbury, but brought into greater prominence by Francis Hutcheson in 1725, to denote a determination of the mind to receive amiable or disagreeable ideas of actions, antecedent to any opinion of advantage or loss to redound from them; conscience.—Moral theology, morale, viewed as a system of spiritual laws proceeding from a divine law-giver; theological ethics.—Moral victory, an actual defeat claimed as a virtual victory. This designation is often applied to a defeat which, as from the reduction of a former adverse majority in a vote, or from other concomitant circumstances, is regarded as having in it the elements of future victory, or at least as giving occasion for some measure of satisfaction.—Moral virtue, a virtue taught by natural ethics, without revelation; opposed to theological virtues, faith, hope, charity.

II. n. 1. Morality; the doctrine or practice of the duties of life. [Rare.]

Their Moral and Economy
Most perfectly they made agree.

Prior, An Epitaph.
2. pl. (a) Conduct; behavior; course of life in regard to right and wrong; specifically, sexual conduct: as, a man of good morals.

Some, as corrupt in their morals as vice could make them, have yet been sollicitous to have their children soberly, virtuously, and piously brought up.

Smith, Sermons. (Latham.)
Their Moral and Economy

Smith, Sermons. (Latham.)
I pray ye beg them upon all occasions;
It mends their morals; never mind the pain.

Byron, Don Juan, II, 1.
(b) Moral philosophy; ethics.—3. The doctrine inculcated by a fable, apologue, or fiction; the practical lesson which anything is designed to teach; hence, intent; meaning.

Whereof examples ben enow
Of him, that thilke moral drowe.

Gower, Conf. Amant, vii.
Real. You have some moral in this Benedicte.

Mary. Moral no, by my troth, I have no moral meaning.
Shak., Much Ado, III, 4, 78.

So, Lady Flora, take my lay,
And, if you find no moral there,
Do look in any glass, and say
What moral is in being fair.

Tennyson, The Day-Dream, Moral.
4. An emblem, personification, or allegory; especially, an allegorical drama. See morality, 6.

The fox, the ape, and the humble-bee,
Worn still at odds, being but three.
There's the moral. Now the t'navoy.

Shak., L. L. L., III, 1, 82.
I Felt. Much whales have I heard on o' the land, who never leave gaping till they've swallowed the whole parish—church, steeples, bells, and all.

Per A pretty moral. Shak., Pericles, II, 1, 20.
In the middle of his play (he it pastoral or comedy, morall or tragedy).

Lastly, Morals (or moralities) teach and illustrate the same religious truths, not by direct representation of scriptural or legendary events and personages, but by allegorical means, abstract figures of virtues or qualities being personified in the characters appearing in these plays.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I, 20.
5. A certainty. [slang.]—6. An exact likeness; a counterpart. [Obsolete or colloq.]

He has got the trick of the eye and the tip of the nose of my uncle; . . . and as for the long chin, it is the very moral of the governor's.

Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, p. 353.
She's the very picture—yes, the very moral of Dick Tennin's Beam.

D. Jerrold, St. Giles and St. James, p. 116. (Hopps.)
=Syn. 2. See morality.—3. See inference.

moral (mor'al), v. t. [F. moraliser, a.] To moralize.

When I did hear
The motley fool thus moral on the time,
My lungs began to crow like chanticleer.

Shak., As you Like It, II, 7, 20

morale (mō-rāl'), n. [Intended for F. moral, m., mental or moral condition, confused with moral, f., morality, good conduct, < moral, moral: see moral.] Moral or mental condition as regards courage, zeal, hope, confidence, and the like; used especially of a body of men engaged in a hazardous enterprise, as soldiers or sailors in time of war.

From a date much earlier than the day when Caesar, defeated at Dyrrachium, gained the empire of the world by so acting as to restore the morale of his army before the great contest at Pharsalia, it has been on this nice feeling of the moral pulse of armies that the skill of great commanders has chiefly depended. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 343.

moralist (mō-rāl-ist), n. [< moral, v., + -er.] A moralizer; a moralist.

Come, you are too severe a moralist.
Shak., Othello, II, 3, 301.

moralisation, moralise, etc. See moralization, etc.

moralism (mō-rāl-izm), n. [< moral + -ism.] 1. A moral maxim or saying; moral counsel or advice; moralizing; inculcation of morality. [Rare.]

Accustomed as he was to the somewhat dreading moralisms of his "congenial friends." Parrar, Julian Home, x.

2. The practice of morality as distinct from religion; the absorption of religion in mere morality.

The first thing that disclosed to Dr. Chalmers the futility of the moralism which was all the religion he had when he began his pastorate at Kilmory was the discovery that it could not bear the scrutiny of the sick-bed.

A. Phelps, My Study, p. 301.

moralist (mō-rāl-ist), n. [= F. moraliste = Sp. Pg. It. moralista; as moral + -ist.] 1. One who teaches morals; a writer or lecturer on ethics; one who inculcates moral duties.

Nature surely (if she will be studied) is the best moralist, and hath much good counsel hidden in her bosom.

Shak., Titus Andronicus, p. 77.

The advice given by a great moralist to his friend was that he should compose his passions.

Addison.

The Rational Moralists (Cudworth, Wollaston, Clarke, Price) give no account of the final end of morality.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 257.

2. One who practises moral as distinguished from religious duties; a merely moral as distinguished from a religious person. [Rare.]

Another is carnal, and a mere moralist.

South, Sermons, VII, 286.

Sweet moralist! afford on life's rough sea,

The Christian has an art unknown to thee.

Corpus, A Reflection on Horace, book II, ode 10.

moralistic (mō-rāl-istik), a. [< moralist + -ic.] Inculcating morality; didactic; as, moralistic poets.

morality (mō-rāl-iti), n.; pl. moralities (-tiz). [< ME. moralite = D. moraliteit = G. moralität = Sw. Dan. moralitet, < OF. moralite, F. moralité = Sp. moralidad = Port. moralidade = It. moralità, moralità, moralis, < L. moralitas (-tas), manner, characteristic, character, < L. morālis, of manner or morals, moral: see moral.] 1. The doctrine or system of duties; morals; ethics.

The end of morality is to procure the affections to obey reason, and not to invade it.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

Moral philosophy, morality, ethics, casuistry, natural law, mean all the same thing, namely, that science which teaches men their duty and the reasons of it.

Paley, Moral Philos., I, 1.

The attempt to exhibit morality as a body of scientific truth fell into discredit, and the disposition to dwell on the emotional side of the moral consciousness became prevalent.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 91.

2. The character of being moral; accord with the rules of right conduct; moral quality; virtuousness: often used in a restricted sense to denote sexual purity.

The morality of an action is founded on the freedom of that principle by virtue of which it is in the agent a power, having all things ready and requisite to the performance of an action, either to perform or not perform it.

South, Sermons.

Until we have altered our dictionaries, and have found some other word than morality to stand in popular use for the duties of man to man, let us refuse to accept as moral the contractor who enriches himself by using large machinery to make pasteboard seats pass as leather for the feet of unhappy conscripts.

George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

3. Moral conduct; the practice of the duties inculcated by the moral rules that are recognized as valid; in a general and collective sense, those forms of human conduct which are the subject of moral judgments.

Morality (in Shaftesbury's theory) is only Beauty in case of its higher stages.

Foster, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 136.

Our theory has been that the development of morality is founded on the action in man of an idea of true or absolute good, consisting in the full realization of the capabilities of the human soul.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 280.

In point of fact, however, morality means nothing more nor less than that state of natural neutrality or indifference to good and evil, to heaven and hell, which distinguishes man from all other existence, and endows him alone with selfhood or freedom.

H. James, Salm, and Shad, p. 4.

Hence—4. The practice of moral duties regarded as apart from and as not based upon vital religious principle.

All others, they (the Jews) thought, served God only with their own inventions, or placed their Religion in dull morality.

Stillington, Sermons, I, viii.

Morality, thou deadly bane,
Thy tens of thousands thou hast slain!
Vain is his hope whose stay and trust is
In moral mercy, truth, and justice!

Burns, Dedication to (David) Hamilton.

5. A moral inference or reflection; a moralization; intent; meaning; moral.

But ye that holden this tale a folie,
As of a fox, or of a cock and hen,
Takes the morality thereof, good men,
Chaucer, Sum's Priest's Tale, I, 620.

A genial optimist, who daily drew
From what he saw his quaint moralities.

Byrd, The Old Man's Counsel.

6. A kind of drama which succeeded the miracle-plays or mysteries, and in which the persons of the play were abstractions, or allegorical representations of virtues, vices, and mental powers and faculties. A popular feature of the morality was the introduction of the Devil and a Vice who under many names attended him, and who was finally merged in the fool of the later drama.

A morality may be defined as a play enforcing a moral truth or lesson by means of the speech and action of characters which are personified abstractions, figures representing virtues and vices, qualities of the human mind, or abstract conceptions in general.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I, 65.

—Syn. 1–3. Morality, Morals, Manners, Virtue, Ethics. Morality (or morals) and manners stand over against each other as respectively conforming to right or propriety in the great duties and in the minor forms of action and intercourse. Morality is often popularly applied to conformity to right in that particular in which right conduct is most felt to be important, as chastity or honesty. Virtue is morality of the fullest type and regarded as a part of personal character. Ethics is the technical, as morals is the popular, name for the science of virtue.

moralization (mō-rāl-iz-ā-shūn), n. [< F. moralisation = Sp. moralización = Port. moralização = It. moralizzazione, < ML. moralizatio (-ō), moralizatio (-ō), < moralizare, moralize: see moralize.] 1. The act of moralizing or reflecting upon morals; a moral reflection.—2. The act of giving a moral meaning or effect to something; explanation in a moral sense.

It is more commendable, and also commendable, if the players have not the moralization of the chess, and when they play do think upon it.

Sir T. Esot, The Governour, I, 25.

Annexed to the fable is a moralization of twice the length in the octave stanza.

T. Norton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III, 417.

John de Vigney wrote a book which he called "The Moralization of Chess," wherein he assures us that this game was invented by a philosopher named Xerxes in the reign of Evil Merodach, King of Babylon, and was made known to that monarch in order to engage his attention and correct his manners. "There are three reasons," says de Vigney, "which induced the philosopher to institute this new pastime: the first, to reclaim a wicked king; the second, to prevent idleness; and the third, practically to demonstrate the nature and necessity of nobleness."

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 408.

3. The act of rendering moral; subjection to moral rules; the process of giving a moral character to something.

The elimination of ethics, then, as a system of precepts, involves no intrinsic difficulties other than those involved in the admission of a natural science that can account for the moralization of man.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 8.

The highest type of moralization lies in acquiring such an abstract basis of principle as makes a man a spontaneous and independent force of justice and goodness, not a mere channel through which runs a public and common beneficence.

W. Wallace, Mind, XIII, 425.

Also spelled moralisation.

moralize (mō-rāl-iz), v.; pret. and pp. moralized, moralizing. [< D. moraliseren = G. moralisieren = Sw. moralisera = Dan. moralisere, < F. moraliser = Sp. Pg. moralizar = It. moralizzare, < ML. moraliza, moralize, < L. moralis, moral: see moral and -ize.] I. trans. 1. To apply to a moral purpose, or to explain in a moral sense; dress a moral front; found moral reflections on.

But what said Jacques?

Did he not moralize this spectacle?

Shak., As you Like It, II, I, 44.

2. To supply with a moral or practical lesson; furnish with edifying examples.

Fierce warres and faithful loves shall moralize my song.
Spenser, F. Q., I, vi.

High as their Trumpets Tune his Lyre he strung,
And with his Prince's Arms he moraliz'd his Song.
Prior, Ode to the Queen, st. 1.

While chastening thoughts of sweetest ease, bestowed
By wisdom, moralize his penative road.
Forster.

3. To exemplify the moral of: as, to moralize a fable. [Rare.]

That which is said of the elephant, that being guilty of his deformity he cannot abide to look on his own face in the water (but seeks for troubled and muddy channels), we see well moralized in men of evil conscience, who know their souls are so filthy that they dare not so much as view them.

Sp. Hall, Meditations and Vows, II, § 4.

This fable is moralized in a common proverb.

Sir R. L. Estrange.

4. To render moral; give a moral character to. It had a large share in moralizing the poor white people of the country.

G. Hamlyn.

'Tis yours with Breeding to refine the Age,
To Chasten Wit, and Moralize the Stage.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, Prol.

As a rule, it will only be to a man already pretty thoroughly moralized by the best social influences that it will occur to reproach himself with having unworthy motives even in irreproachable conduct.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 200.

5. To affect strongly the moral or religious sense of; bring into a state of intense moral or religious feeling. [Rare.]

The negroes and many of the poor whites were, for a week or two, not exactly "d-moralized" (by an earthquake), but intensely moralized, giving themselves to religious exercises of a highly emotional character.

Science, IX, 491.

II. intrans. 1. To make moral reflections; draw practical lessons from the facts of life.

Thou hear'st me moralize,

Applying this to that, and so to so,

For love can comment upon every woe.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, I, 712.

I know you come abroad only to moralize and make observations.

Steele, Tatler, No. 170.

Peter of Blois moralizing "de prastigia fortune," on the magic tricks of Fortune exemplified in the career of his royal patron.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 147.

2. To have an influence, especially a beneficial influence, on morals.

It is not so much that a social life passed in peaceful occupation is positively moralizing as that a social life passed in war is positively demoralizing.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 575.

Also spelled moralise.

moralizer (mō-rāl-iz-er), n. 1. One who moralizes or makes moral reflections; an instructor in morals.

My uncle was a moralizer who mistook his apophthegms for principles.

T. Hook, Sayings and Doings.

In fact there is scarcely any point upon which moralizers have dwelt with more emphasis than this, that man's forecast of pleasure is continually erroneous.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 121.

2. One who has a habit of finding an allegory or hidden meaning in passages.

Moralizers, you that wrest a never meant meaning out of everything, applying all things to the present time, keep your attention for the common stage.

Nash, Sumner's Last Will and Testament.

Also spelled moraliser.

moralizing (mō-rāl-iz-ing), n. [Verbal n. of moralize, v.] A moral reflection; a moralization. Also spelled moralising.

It will be seen by these edifying moralizings how eminently scriptural was the course of Sam's mind.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 350.

morally (mō-rāl-i), adv. 1. From a moral point of view; with reference to the moral law; in a moral or ethical sense; ethically.

If good, morally so called, bonum honestum ought chiefly to be understood.

South, Sermons.

The essential thing morally is the man's direction of himself to the realization of a conceived or imagined object, whether circumstances allow of its issuing in outward action, action that affects the senses of other people, or no.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 144.

2. In accordance with moral law; rightly; virtuously; uprightly.

To take away rewards and punishments is only pleasing to a man who resolves not to live morally.

Dryden.

3. Virtually; practically; to all intents and purposes.

It is morally impossible for a hypocrite to keep himself long on his guard.

Sir R. L. Estrange.

morass (mō-rās'), n. [= G. morast = Sw. moras = Dan. morade, < D. moeras, MD. moerasch, moerasch, moerasch = LG. MLG. moras, a marsh, fen; prob. orig. adj., MD. moerisch (= E. moorish), belonging to a moor, confused appar. with F. marais, > ME. marais, etc., a marsh; see marish.] A tract of low, soft, wet ground, the drainage of which is insufficient either from in depressed situation or from its uniform flatness; a marsh; a swamp; a bog; a fen.—Morass are bog-iron ore.—Syn. Swamp, etc. See marsh. marsh-wood (mō-rās wōd), n. The plant hornwort, Ceratophyllum demersum. morassy (mō-rās'ī), a. [= D. morasig = G. morasig = Sw. morasig = Dan. morasig; as morass + -y.] Marshy; fenney.

The sides and top are covered with morassy earth.

morat (mō'rat), n. [It. morato, mulberry-colored, < moro, < L. morum, a mulberry: see more.] A beverage composed of honey flavored with mulberry-juice.

There was grace after meat with a fist on the board.

And down went the morat, and out flew the sword.

Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, ll. 6.

moratel, a. [L. moratus, mannered, < mor (mor-), inanner: see moral.] Manner-d.

To see a man well morate so seldom is applauded.

Gaule, Magistrate, p. 138. (Knege, Dict.)

moration (mō-rā'shon), n. [L. moratio, n., delay, < morari, pp. moratus, delay, tarry, < mora, delay: see mora.] The act of staying, delaying, or lingering; delay.

For therein [in the northern hemisphere, and in the apogee] his moration is slower, and so his heat respectively unto those habitations as of duration, so also of more effect.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err. vi. 10.

moratorium (mō-rā-tō'ri-um), n. [L. moratorium, sing. of moratorium, causing delay, dilatory.] In law, legal title to delay in making a due payment: as a legislative authorization of suspension of payment by a government bank.

Moravian (mō-rā'vi-an), a. and n. [Lat. Moravia (see def.) + -an.] 1. Pertaining to Moravia or the Moravians.—2. Pertaining to the religious denomination of the Moravians.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Moravia, a crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, lying southeast of Bohemia. The Moravians are Slavs in race and language, closely allied to the Czechs.—2. A member of the Christian denomination entitled the Unitas Fratrum or United Brethren, which traces its origin to John Huss. Its members were expelled from Bohemia and from Moravia in 1627, but in 1722 a remnant settled in Herrnhut, Saxony (hence the brethren are sometimes, in Germany, called Herrnhuter). The organization at present has three home provinces (German, British, and American)—each of which has its own government by synod and several mission provinces. All these together form a whole, represented by a general synod, which meets every ten years in Herrnhut. The ministers are bishops (not diocesan), presbyters, and deacons. The worship is liturgical. The members of the denomination believe in the scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice, and maintain the doctrine of the total depravity of human nature, the love of God the Father, the actual humanity and godhead of Jesus Christ, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, good works as the fruit of the Spirit, the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The Moravians are especially noted for their energy and success in missionary work.

Thicker than arguments, temptations throng, At best more watchful this, but that more strong. Pope, Essay on Man, II. 76.

[In this sense more is regularly used to modify an adjective or adverb and form a comparative phrase, having the same force and effect as the comparative degree made by the termination -er, as, more wise (wiser), more wisely; more illustrious, more illustriously; more contemptible, more durably. It may be used before any adjective or adverb which admits of comparison, and is generally used with words of more than two syllables, in which the use of the suffix -er would be awkward, as, more curious, more eminent, etc., formations like curiosier, eminensier, etc., being avoided, though occasionally used in older writers. Formerly more was very often used superlatively in the comparative: as, more better, braver, after, mightier, etc.]

2. Further; to a greater distance.

And yet we ascended war and came to the place where our Lord Christ saying and be holding the Cille of Jerusalem upon Palme of Sonday wepte. Turkington, Diary of Eng. Travell, p. 28.

Moringiidae (mō-ring'-gā-ō), n. pl. [NL., < Moringa + -idae.] A family of mureinoid apodal fishes represented by the genus Moringia. They are of eel-like form, with specially elongated abdominal region; the heart is situated far behind the gills, and the pterygopalatine arch and opercular apparatus are imperfect. The several species inhabit Oriental seas. Also Pigobranchium.

Morin's apparatus. [After the French inventor A. J. Morin (1795-1880).] An apparatus designed to illustrate the laws of falling bodies. It consists of a light wooden cylinder covered with paper, made to rotate uniformly about a vertical axis, in front of which falls a small weight, guided by two light wires. A pencil attached to the falling weight traces out on the paper of the rotating cylinder a line which, so long as the effect of the air resistance is negligible, is found to be a parabolic curve. The distance fallen through is then shown to vary according to the square of the time, in accordance with the theoretical law.

Morio (mō'-ri-ō), n. [NL., < L. morio, a fool, a monster.] 1. In entom., a genus of carabid beetles, containing such as M. monticola of the southern United States. The genus pertains to the scaritid section of Carabidae, and is sometimes made type of a family Morioidae. It is of wide distribution but has only about 25 species. These are mainly South American but some are found in Africa, the East Indies, and Australia, and 2 in Europe. One occurs in the United States. Latreille, 1830.

Luxuria ys a lyther normale. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 218.

They will give him a quantity of the quintessence shall serve him to cure kibes or the mormalt of the shin. R. Jonson, Mercury Vindicated.

mormeluchet, n. [< Gr. μωρμολύχαι, μωρμολύχαι, a bugbear, hobgoblin, < μωρμολύχαι, also μωρμολύχαι, frighten, scare, be scared, < μωρμολύχαι, a bugbear.] A hobgoblin; a bugbear.

They hear and see many devils, bugbears, and mormeluches. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 658.

mormo (mōr'-mō), n. [NL. in sense 2, < Gr. μωρμολύχαι, also μωρμολύχαι, a hideous she-monster, a bugbear.] 1†. A bugbear; false terror.

One would think by this play the devils were mere mormos and bugbears, fit only to fright children and fools. Jerry Collier, English Stage, p. 192. (Halliwell.)

The mormos and bugbears of a frightened rabble. Warburton, Prodigies, p. 80.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of noctuid moths of the subfamily Amphipyrrinae, erected by Hübner in 1810, having the tufted abdomen extended beyond the hind wings. The only species, M. maura, is distributed throughout Europe.

Mormon¹ (mōr'-mōn), n. [NL., < Gr. μωρμολύχαι, a bugbear: see mormo.] In zool., the name, generic or specific, of several animals. (a) In mammal.: (1) (f. c.) The specific name of the mandrill, a baboon, Cynocephalus mormon. See mandrill. (2) A genus of such baboons first cited by Lesson, 1840. M. leucophaea is the drill. See Cynocephalus. (b) In ornith., a genus of puffins of the family Alcidae, founded by Illiger, 1811: now more frequently called Fratercula. M. arctica is a current name of the common puffin; M. cirratus, of the tufted puffin. See Fratercula, Lunda, and cut under puffin.

Mormon² (mōr'-mōn), n. [Prop. attrib. use (the Mormon Church, Bible, etc.) of Mormon, one of the characters of the "Book of Mormon," from whom it derives that name.] An adherent of a religious body in the United States, which calls itself "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." This denomination was founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Vermont. The government of the church is a hierarchy consisting of two orders of priesthood, an order of Melchizedek (the higher) and an Aaronic or lesser order. The former is presided mornspeech, n. Same as morn-speech.

It is ordained to have four mornspeeches in the zone.
English Birds (E. T. S.), p. 46.

morn-tide, n. Same as morn-tide.

morn-whit, n. [ME. mornwhite.] The morning time.

Not by one after mynnyghte alle his made changede.
He mett in the morn the fulle marvelous dremes!
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3224.

moro (mô'ro), n. [NL., < L. morus, a mulberry; see moro.] The vinous grosbeak, stonebird, or desert-trumpeter, Carpodacus (Buccones) guthrieus, a small fringillid bird.

Moroccan (mô-rok'ân), a. [< Morocco (see moro) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Morocco, a sultanate in northwestern Africa, lying west of Algeria, or its inhabitants.

The Jew is still the most remarkable element in the Moroccan population.
The Academy, No. 401, p. 371.

Morocco (mô-rok'ô), n. and a. [Short for Morocco leather; cf. equiv. maroquin, < F. maroquin = Sp. marroquin = Pg. marroquim = It. marrochino, with accom. adj. form, = E. -net; so called from Morocco or Marocco (ME. Marrok), < Ar. Murrukush, the city which gave its name to the country, and in which the manufacture of Morocco leather is still carried on.]
1. n. 1. Leather made from goatskins, tanned with sunbeams, originally in the Barbary States, but afterward very largely in the Levant, and now produced in Europe from skins imported from Asia and Africa. The peculiar qualities of true Morocco are great firmness of texture with flexibility, and a grained surface, of which there are many varieties. This surface is produced by an embossing process called grain-fog. True Morocco is of extreme hardness, and makes the most durable bookbindings. It is used also for upholstering seats and for similar purposes, and to a certain extent in shoemaking.
2. Leather made in imitation of this, often of sheepskins, and used for the same purposes, but much more largely in shoemaking.—3. A very strong kind of ale anciently made in Cumberland, said to have a certain amount of beef among its ingredients, the recipe being kept a secret.—French Morocco, in bookbinding, an inferior quality of Levant Morocco, having usually a smaller and less prominent grain.—Levant Morocco. See leopard.

II. a. Made or consisting of Morocco; also, of the common red color of Morocco leather.
Morocco (mô-rok'ô), v. t. To convert into Morocco.
Morocco gum. See gum arabic, under gum.
Morocco-head (mô-rok'ô-head), n. The American sheldrake or merganser, Mergam americana. [New Jersey.]
Morocco-jaw (mô-rok'ô-jâ), n. The surf-scooter or surf-duck, Edemia perspicillata; so called from the color of the beak. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Long Island.]

Morology (mô-ro-lô-jî), n. [< Gr. morologia, foolish talking, < morologos, talking foolishly, < moros, foolish, + logos, speak; see -ology.] Foolish speech. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

Morone (mô-ro-n'), n. [< L. morus, a mulberry-tree; see moro.] Same as maron.
Moronobea (mô-ro-nô-bé-â), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), < moronobea, the native name of the tree among the Galibis of Guiana.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants of the polypetalous order Guttifera, type of the tribe Moronobea, distinguished by short sepals, erect twisted petals, and spirally twisted filaments partly monadelphous. One species, M. cocconia, is known, native of tropical America. It is a tall tree, with long horizontal branches, large white solitary flowers, spirally grooved berries, and a copious gummy juice. See hog gum.

Moronobes (mô-ro-nô-bé-â), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1830), < Moronobea + -es.] A tribe of plants of the order Guttifera, typified by the genus Moronobea, and characterized by the absence of cotyledons and by an elongated style. It includes 5 genera, of tropical America, Africa, and Madagascar, all shrubs or trees with gummy juice, one of which the Platanus of South American forests, reaches an immense size.

Morose (mô-rô-s'), a. [= F. morose, < L. morosus, particular, acerbulous, fastidious, self-willed, wayward, capricious, fretful, peevish, < mos (mor-), way, custom, habit, self-will; see morall.] 1. Fastidious; scrupulous.

Speak morose things always, and loose things at table.
Bacon's Book (E. E. T. S.), II. 20.

2. Of a sour temper; severe; sullen and austere.

A morose, ill-conditioned, ill-natured person in all clubs and companies whatsoever.
South, Sermons, VI. 111.

Sometimes at that moment pinched him close,
Else he would seldom bitter or morose.
Cowper, Epistle to J. Hill.

Morose (mô-rô-s'), a. [= F. morose, < L. morosus, particular, acerbulous, fastidious, self-willed, wayward, capricious, fretful, peevish, < mos (mor-), way, custom, habit, self-will; see morall.] 1. Fastidious; scrupulous.

Speak morose things always, and loose things at table.
Bacon's Book (E. E. T. S.), II. 20.

2. Of a sour temper; severe; sullen and austere.

A morose, ill-conditioned, ill-natured person in all clubs and companies whatsoever.
South, Sermons, VI. 111.

Sometimes at that moment pinched him close,
Else he would seldom bitter or morose.
Cowper, Epistle to J. Hill.

—Syn. 2. Gloomy, Sulky, etc. (see collo), gruff, crabbed, crusty, churlish, surly, ill-natured, ill-natured, cross-grained.

morose (mô-rô-s'), a. [= OF. moros = Sp. It. moroso, lingering, slow, < ML. morosus, lingering, slow, < L. mora, delay; see mora.] The form was appar. due in part to morose.] Lingering; persistent.

Here are forbidden all wanton words, and all morose delighting in venereal thoughts.
Jer. Taylor.

Morose delectation, in theol., pleasure in the remembrance of past impurities.

morosely (mô-rô-s'li), adv. In a morose manner; sourly; with sullen austerity.

moroseness (mô-rô-s'ness), n. The state or quality of being morose; sourness of temper; sullenness.

morosity (mô-rô-s'i-ti), n. [< F. morosité, < L. morositas (-s), peevishness, < morosus, peevish; see morose.] 1. Moroseness.

Blot out all peevish dispositions and morosities.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 199.

2. Morose people.

Fears not what those morose (read morosities) will murmur whose dead cinders brook no glowing sparks, nor care not for the opinion of such as hold none but philosophy for a subject.
Greene's Vision.

Diogenes was one of the first and foremost of this rusty morosity.
Nash, Unfortunate Traveller.

morosoph (mô-ro-sôf), n. [< OF. morosoph, < L. morosophos, foolishly wise, < Gr. moros, foolish, + sophos, wise, < sophomoros.] A philosophical or learned fool.

Heroby you may perceive how much I do attribute to the wise foolery of our morosoph, Triboulet.
Laubach, tr. by Ozell, III. 46. (Nares.)

morosous (mô-rô-s'us), a. [< ML. morosus, lingering; see morose.] Same as morose.
Daily experience either of often lapses, or morosous desires.
Sheldon, Miracles (1816), p. 201.

morowet, n. A Middle English form of morrow.

morowespecht, n. Same as morn-speech.

morowetide, n. Same as morn-tide.

moroxite (mô-rok'sit), n. [< Gr. moroxite, moroxite, a variety of pipe-clay, + -ite.] A crystallized form of apatite, occurring in crystals of brownish or greenish-blue color. It is found in Norway.

Morphean (môr-fe-an), a. [< L. Morpheus, q. v. + -an.] Of or belonging to Morpheus, a god of dreams in the later Roman poets.

The Morphean fount
Of that fine element that visions, dreams,
And fitful whims of sleep are made of.
Keats, Endymion, l.

morphetic (môr-fet'ik), a. [Irreg. < Morpheus, q. v. + -etic.] Pertaining to sleep; slumberous. [Rare.]

I am involuntarily asleep at this very moment; in the very centre of the morphetic domain.
Mrs. Burney, Camilla, II. 4.

Morpheus (môr-fus), n. [L. (in Ovid, the first classical writer who mentions Morpheus), < Gr. as if Morpheus*, god of dreams, so called from the form he calls up before the sleeper, < morpos, form.] In the later Roman poets, a god of dreams, son of Sleep; hence, sleep.

morpheus (môr-fu), n. [Also morfeus, morpheus, morpheus; < F. morpheus, morpheus = Sp. morpheus = Pg. morpheus = It. morpheus, morpheus, < ML. morpheus, also morpheus, a scurfy eruption, prob. for morpheus* (cf. equiv. morpheus), prob. < Gr. morpos, form, shape.] A scurfy eruption. Dungham.

A morpheus or stayning of the skin.
Not. Dictionary, under Alphos ed. 1659. (Halliwell.)

No man ever saw a gray hair on the head or beard of any Truth, wrinkle, or morpheus on its face.
N. Ward, Simple Cocker, p. 28.

morpheus (môr-fu), v. t. [< morpheus, n.] To cover with morpheus.

Whose handless bonnet veils his cloggrown chin
And sullen rage bewray his morpheus skin.
Sp. Hall, Salmes, IV. v. 20.

Do you call this painting?
No, no, but you call it a covering of an old
Morpheus lady, to make her disown her again.
W. Butler, Duchess of Malfi, II. 1.

morphia (môr-fi-â), n. [NL., < L. Morpheus, q. v.] Same as morphine.

morphic (môr-fik), a. [< Gr. morpos, form, + -ic.] In biol., of or pertaining to form; morphological; as, a morphic character.

The majority of specific characters are of divergent origin, are morphic as distinguished from developmental.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 111.

Morphic valence, morphological value or equivalency in the scale of evolution of organic forms. Thus, any organism, in the gastrula stage of development is a gastrula form, having the morphic valence of a gastrula. Cous.

Morphides (môr-fi-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Morpheus + -ides.] The Morphides rated as a family.

Morphine (môr-fi-nê), n. pl. [NL., < Morpheus + -ine.] A subfamily of nymphalid butterflies, typified by the genus Morpho, with large wings, grooved to receive the short abdomen, and ocellated on the under side, and filiform antennae. They are found in tropical America and the East Indian islands, with a few in continental Asia. The genera and upward of 100 species compose the subfamily.

morphine (môr-fin), n. [< F. morphine = Pg. morfina = It. morfina, < NL. morfina, morfine, < L. Morpheus, the god of sleep; see Morpheus.] An alkaloid, C₁₇H₁₉NO₃, the most important narcotic principle of opium. It crystallizes in brilliant, colorless, odorless, and bitter prisms. It dulls pain, induces sleep, promotes perspiration, checks peristalsis, contracts the pupil, and is extensively used in medicine in the form of its soluble salts. In large doses it causes death with narcotic symptoms.—Morphine or morphia process, in photog., a dry collodion process, now abandoned, in which the preservative agent was a bath of morphine acetate, one grain to the ounce.

morphinism (môr-fin-izm), n. [< Morphine + -ism.] A morbid state induced by the use of morphine.

That class of diseases in which morphinism, caffeine, and vanillism are found.
The American, XII. 303.

morphinomania (môr-fi-nô-mâ-ni-â), n. [NL.] Same as morphinomania.

morphinomaniac (môr-fi-nô-mâ-ni-ak), n. Same as morphinomaniac.

morphiomania (môr-fi-ô-mâ-ni-â), n. [< NL. morphia, q. v., + L. mama, madness; see mania.] A morbid and uncontrollable appetite for morphine or opium; the morphine-habit or opium-habit.

morphiomaniac (môr-fi-ô-mâ-ni-ak), n. [< morphiomania + -ac.] One who suffers from morphinomania.

The question arose as to how morphinomania procured the morphine.
Lancet, No. 3444, p. 451.

morphimetric (môr-fi-ô-mê-trik), a. [< NL. morphia + Gr. metron, measure.] Measuring the amount of morphine; as, morphimetric assays of opium.

Morphus (môr-fus), n. [NL., < L. Morpheus, a kind of eagle that lives near lakes, < Gr. morpos, dusky, dark; said of an eagle.] A genus of South American diurnal birds of prey founded by Cuvier in 1817; the eagle-hawks. There is but one species, M. guianensis, of large size, 3 feet long, with a crest. Also Morphus.

Morpho (môr-fô), n. [NL., < Gr. Morpheus, 'the shapely,' a name of Aphrodite at Sparta, < morpos, form, shape.] A genus of magnificent nymphalid butterflies, typical of the subfamily Morphina. There are upward of 30 species, mostly South American, some expanding over 7 inches, others of celestial blue hues above and ocellated below. M. achilles, M. laertes, M. cypris, M. neptolemus, and M. polyphemus are examples.

morphea (môr-fê-â), n. [NL., for morpheus, < ML. morphea, 'morpheus, a scurfy eruption; see morpheus.] A disease of the corium presenting multiple roundish patches, at first pinkish and slightly elevated, later pale, smooth, shining, and level or slightly depressed. There is atrophy of the papillary layer of the corium, and cellular infiltration about hair-follicles, sweat-glands, and sebaceous glands and vessels; this infiltration contracts, with subsequent atrophy of glands, follicles, and vessels. The disease is allied to scleroderma.

morphogenesis (môr-fô-jen'ê-sis), n. [NL.; < Gr. morpos, form, + genesis, origin; see genesis.] The genesis of form; the production of morphological characters; morphogeny.

morphogenetic (môr-fô-jen'et'ik), a. [< morphogenesis + -ic; see genesis.] Of or pertaining to morphogenesis; morphological, with special reference to ontogeny and phylogeny; embryological in a broad sense; evolutionary or developmental, with reference to biogeny.

morphogenic (môr-fô-jen'ik), a. Same as morphogenetic.

morphogeny (môr-fô-jen'i), n. [< Gr. morpos, form, + genesis, generation; see geny. Cf. morphogenesis.] 1. In biol., morphogenesis; the genesis of form; the production or evolution of those forms of living matter the study of which is the province of the science of morphology.—2. The history of the evolution of the forms of organisms; morphology, or the science of the forms of living bodies, with special reference to the manner in which, or the means by which, such forms originate or develop; embryology in a broad sense.

Biogeny, or the history of the evolution of organisms, up to the present time has been almost exclusively morphogeny.
Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 203.

Do you call this painting?
No, no, but you call it a covering of an old
Morpheus lady, to make her disown her again.
W. Butler, Duchess of Malfi, II. 1.

morphia (môr-fi-â), n. [NL., < L. Morpheus, q. v.] Same as morphine.

morphic (môr-fik), a. [< Gr. morpos, form, + -ic.] In biol., of or pertaining to form; morphological; as, a morphic character.

The majority of specific characters are of divergent origin, are morphic as distinguished from developmental.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 111.

Morphic valence, morphological value or equivalency in the scale of evolution of organic forms. Thus, any organism, in the gastrula stage of development is a gastrula form, having the morphic valence of a gastrula. Cous.

morphographer (môr-fôg'gr-fer), n. [< morphograph- + -er.] One who investigates morphology or writes on that science.

morphographical (môr-fô-graf'i-kal), a. [< morphograph- + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to morphology. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 818.

morphography (môr-fôg'gr-ff), n. [< Gr. morphe, form, + -graphia, < graphein, write.] Descriptive morphology; the systematic investigation, tabulation, and description of the structure of animals, including comparative anatomy, histology, and embryology, and the distribution of animals in time and in space, with special reference to their classification; general or systematic zoology.

Morphography.—The work of the collector and systematist; exemplified by Linnaeus and his predecessors. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 808.

morphocithal (môr-fô-les'i-thal), a. [< morphocithus + -al.] Germinal or formative, as the vitellus; of or pertaining to the morphocithus.

morphocithus (môr-fô-les'i-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. morphe, form, + cithos, the yolk of an egg.] In embryol., the vitellus formative, or formative yolk, which undergoes segmentation and germination. It constitutes all the yolk of holoblastic eggs, as those of mammals, but only a part (usually a small part) of the yolk of meroblastic eggs, as of birds, the rest being all food yolk or trophocithus.

morphologic (môr-fô-loj'ik), a. [= F. morphologique; as morphology + -ic.] Same as morphological.

morphological (môr-fô-loj'i-kal), a. [< morphologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to morphology; of the character of morphology.

The most characteristic morphological peculiarity of the plant is the investment of each of its component cells by a sac, the walls of which contain cellulose or some closely analogous compound. . . . The most characteristic morphological peculiarity of the animal is the absence of any such cellulose investment. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 46.

Morphological botany.—See botany. — Morphological classification, a statement or tabulation or other exhibit of the degrees of structural likeness observed in animal or vegetable organisms. Such classification, based on form without regard to function, and thus appreciating true morphological characters while depreciating mere adaptive modifications, is the main aim of modern taxonomy in zoology and botany. The term is also sometimes applied to classifications of languages. Morphological equivalents. See equivalent.

morphologically (môr-fô-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In a morphological manner; with reference to the facts or principles of morphology; from a morphological point of view.

morphologist (môr-fô-lôj'ist), n. [< morphology + -ist.] One who is versed in morphology; a student of morphology.

morphology (môr-fô-lôj'i), n. [= F. morphologie = Sp. morfología = Pg. morfologia, < Gr. morphe, form, + -logia, < logos, speak; see -ology.] 1. The science of organic form; the science of the outer form and internal structure (without regard to the functions) of animals and plants; that department of knowledge which treats both of the ideal types or plans of structure, and of their actual development or expression in living organisms. It has the same scope and application in organic nature that crystallography has in the inorganic. — 2. The science of structure, or of forms, in language. It is that division of the study of language which deals with the origin and function of inflections and derivational forms, or of the more formal as distinguished from the more material part of speech.

Morphology is the science of form (Gr. morphe), and is here applied to the forms of words as developed by the various kinds of mutation. S. S. Hall, man, Outlines of Etymology, p. 17.

morphometrical (môr-fô-met'ri-kal), a. [< morphometry + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to morphometry.

morphometry (môr-fô-met'ri), n. [< Gr. morphe, form, + -metria, < metron, measure.] The art of measuring or ascertaining the external form of objects. Thomas, Med. Diet.

morphon (môr-fôn), n. [NL., < Gr. morphe, form.] A morphological element or factor.

morphonomic (môr-fô-nom'ik), a. [< morphon- + -ic.] Of or pertaining to morphonomy; morphologically consequent.

morphonomy (môr-fôn-nô-mi), n. [< Gr. morphe, form, + -nomia, < nomos, distribute; see nom-.] In phil., the laws of morphology; the observed sequence of causes and effect in organic formation; that department of biology which investigates the principles of organic formation or configuration.

morphotribe (môr-fôf'i-tribe), n. [< Gr. morphe, form, + -tribe, a tribe.] The tribal history of forms; that branch of phylogeny, or tribal history, which treats of form alone, without reference to function, the tribal history of the latter being called phytophyly. Haeckel.

morphosis (môr-fô-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. morphe, a shaping, < morphein, form, shape, < morphein, form.] Morphogenesis; the order or mode of formation of any organ or organism.

morpion (môr-pi-qu), n. [< F. morpion, a crab-louse, appar. < mordre (< L. mordere), bite, + -ion (= It. pedone, *< M.L. pedu(n)-, equiv. to pediculus, a louse, < pedis, a louse, < pes (ped-), = E. foot.)] The crab-louse, Phthirus pubis. See cut under crab-louse.

Swore you had broke and robbed his house,
And stole his tailman's louse,
His flea, his morpion, and punge. S. Butler, Hudibras, III, l. 458.

morpunkie (môr-pung'kê), n. [< Hind. morpunkhi, a boat with a peacock decoration, a pleasure-boat, < mor, a peacock, + punkhi, a fan, also a bird, dim. of pankhi, a fan, < pankh, a feather, wing, pinion; see punka.]] A native pleasure-boat formerly much used for state occasions on the rivers of India. It is very long and narrow, often seating thirty or forty men; it is propelled with paddles, and steered with a large sweep which rises from the stern in the form of a peacock or a dragon.

Morrenian (môr-rê-ni-an), a. [< Morren (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to the Belgian naturalist C. F. A. Morren (1807-58); specifically applied in zoology to certain glands of worms, as the earthworm, the function of which seems to be to adapt the ingesta for nutrition.

Morrhua (môr-fô-), n. [NL., < M.L. morrha, morula (F. morue), a cod; said to be ult. *< L. merula (F), a fish, the sea-earp.] The principal genus of gadoid fishes, including the common cod; now called Gadus. M. vulgaris is the cod, M. aglepinus the haddock, etc. See cuts under cod and haddock.

morrice, morrice-dance, etc. See morrist, etc. morricer (môr-ris-er), n. [< morrice + -er.] A morrice-dancer. Scott, L. of the L., v. 22.

morrist, n. See morrist.

morrist (môr-ris), n. and a. [< Also morrice; *< ME. morris, morrice, morrice, < OF. morris, morisque, morisque, F. moresque = It. moresco, *< Sp. Morisco, Moorish, < Moro, a Moor; see Moor. Cf. Moresque, Morisco.] I. n. 1. Same as morrist-dance.

We are the bulcher to a morrice,
A kind of manque, wherof good store is In the country hereabout. B. Jonson, The Satyr.

He had that whole bevy at command, whether in morrice or at May pole. Milton, Apology for smectymnus

2. A dance resembling the morrist-dance.

We'll have some sport,
Some mad morrice or other for our money, tutor
Fletcher, Whigmore Chase, III, 1.

Nine men's morrice, a game in which a figure of squares one within another was made on a table or on the ground, and eighteen pieces or stones, nine for each side, which were placed by turns in the angles, were moved alternately as at draughts. He who was enabled to place three in a straight line took off one of his adversary's at any point he pleased, and the game ended by the loss of all the men of one of the players. It was also a table game played with counters. Also called nine men's morris. Strutt

The nine men's morrice is fill'd up with mud,
And the quaint mazes in the wanton green
For lack of tread are undistinguishable. Shak., M. N. D., II, 1, 28.

II. a. Belonging to or taking part in a morrist-dance.

Bills of mortality, abstracts from public registers showing the numbers that have died in any parish or place during certain periods of time.

He proceeded to acquaint her who of quality was well or sick within the bills of mortality.

Scott, Tatler, No. 207.

Law of mortality, the principle, deduced from a study and analysis of the bills of mortality and the experiences of insurance companies during a long number of years, which determines what average proportion of the persons who enter upon a particular period of life will die during that period, and consequently the proportion of those who will survive. Tables showing the estimated number of persons of a given age that will die in each succeeding year are called tables of mortality. Thus, of 100,000 persons of the age of 10, 400 will not reach the age of 11; of 98,500 persons remaining alive, 397 will die before reaching the age of 12, and so on. On these tables are largely founded the calculations of insurance actuaries in regard to rates of premium, present value of policies, etc.

mortalize (môr'tal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mortalized, pp. mortalizing. [< mortal + -ize.] To make mortal. Also spelled mortalise.

mortar, MHG. morters, morter, mörtel, G. mörtel, L. mortarium, mortar, a mixture of lime and sand, so called from the vessel in which it was made, a mortar: see mortar.] A material used (in building) for binding together stones or bricks so that the mass may form one compact whole. The use of mortar dates back to the earliest recorded history, but various materials were employed for that purpose. "Bitumen" (asphaltum and maltha), or bituminous mixtures, are known to have been used in Babylon and Nineveh. Plaster (calcined sulphate of lime) was the cement employed on the Great Pyramid, and apparently by the Egyptians generally, but not to the entire exclusion of what is now ordinarily called mortar. The substances mentioned are frequently designated as mortar in non-technical works. What is now generally understood by this term among builders and architects is a mixture of lime with water and sand, in various proportions, according to the "fatness" of the lime and the desire to economize the more costly material. This kind of mortar was well known to both Greeks and Romans. Mortar made of ordinary lime "sets" (hardens) in the air (not under water) and slowly, since the absorption of carbonic acid and the consequent conversion of the hydrate of lime into the carbonate is by no means a rapid process. The hardening of the mortar depends in large part on the crystallization of the carbonate of lime around the grains of sand, by which these are made to cohere firmly, hence, a clean sand of which the grains are angular is of importance in forming a durable mortar. The kind of mortar which sets under water is sometimes called hydraulic mortar, but is more generally known as hydraulic cement, or simply cement. See cement and cement stone.

mort gag, mortgage, F. mortgage, lit. a dead pledge, cf. mort, dead, + gag, a pledge; see mort and gag.] 1. (a) At common law (and according to the present rule in some of the United States, and in form in nearly all, if not all, the States), a conveyance of real estate or some interest therein, defeasible upon the payment of money or the performance of some other condition. (b) By the law of most of the United States, a lien or charge upon specific property, real or personal, created by what purports to be an express transfer of title, with or without possession, but accompanied by a condition that the transfer shall be void if in due time the money be paid or the thing done to secure which the transfer is given. It differs from a pledge in that it is not confined to personal property, and in that it is in form a transfer of title, while a pledge is of chattels and is usually a transfer of possession without the title, but with authority to sell and transfer both title and possession in case of default. (See pledge.) At common law a mortgage was regarded as in form it is still almost universally expressed as actually transferring the title.
(See cf. above.) Courts of equity established the rule that a mortgage of real property could, by payment or performance, redeem it even after default, at any time before the court had adjudged his right foreclosed or the mortgagee had caused a sale of the property to pay the debt (see equity of redemption, under equity); consequently mortgages ceased to be regarded in most jurisdictions as a transfer of the title, and are now generally held to create a mere lien, although the form of the instrument is unchanged. The term mortgage is applied differently
(a) to the transaction, (b) to the deed by which it is effected, and (c) to the rights conferred thereby on the mortgagee.

2. A state or condition resembling that of mortgaged property.

His truth pletheth with in mortgage.

Whiche if he broke, it is falsehood.

Quaker, Conf. Amant, vii.

Though God permitted the Jews, in punishment of their rebellions, to be captivated by the devil in slavery, yet the Jews were but as in a mortgage, for they had been God's peculiar people before. Donne, Sermons, iii.

Chattel mortgage. See chattel. Equitable mortgage, a transaction which has the intent but not the form of a mortgage, and which a court of equity will enforce to the same extent as a mortgage, as, for instance, a loan on the faith of a deposit of title-deeds. General mortgage, bond. See bond. Mortgage debentures. See debentures. Welsh mortgage, a kind of mortgage formerly used in Wales and Ireland, by which the mortgagor, without engaging personally for the payment of the debt, transferred the title and possession of the property to the mortgagee, who was to take the rents and profits and apply them on the interest, and there might be a stipulation that any surplus should be applied on the principal. Under this form of mortgage the mortgagee could not compel the mortgagor to redeem or be foreclosed of his right to redeem, for no time was fixed for payment, and the mortgagee was never in default, but the mortgagor had the right at any time to redeem (and, though there were no personal debt, an account might be taken as if there were, in order to ascertain what he must pay to redeem); and the statute of limitations did not begin to run against his claim until after full payment of the principal.

mortgage (môr'gaj), v. t., pret. and pp. mortgaged, pp. mortgaging. [cf. mortgage, n.] 1.

To grant (land, houses, or other immovable property) as security for money lent or contracted to be paid, or other obligation, on condition that if the obligation shall be discharged according to the contract the grant shall be

These [statues] in the east, where they were mortuaries upon which, the dead, and the dead, were lying, turning the head into a gateway and reducing its inhabitants to darkness.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 144.

Attenuation in mortuaries, an alienation of lands or tenements to any corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, particularly to religious houses, by which the estate becomes perpetually alienated in the very nature and unalienable. — Mortuaries Act, an English statute of 1780 (9 Geo. III., c. 80), based on the impolicy of allowing gifts, under the name of charity, to be made by persons in view of approaching death, to the disinheritance of their lawful heirs. It prohibits, except in the instance of some universities and colleges, all alienation of land for charitable purposes (unless on full and valuable consideration) otherwise than by deed indented and executed in the presence of two or more witnesses, twelve months before the death of the donor, and enrolled in chancery within six months after its date, and taking effect in possession immediately after the making thereof, and without power of revocation or any reservation for the benefit of the grantor or persons claiming under him. — Statutes of mortuaries, the name under which are known a number of English statutes, beginning in 1225 (5 Hen. III., c. 30; 7 Edw. I., c. 2; 13 Edw. I., c. 32; 15 Rich. II., c. 5; 23 Hen. VIII., c. 10), restricting or forbidding the giving of land to religious houses. The Mortuaries Act (which see, above) is sometimes incorrectly called a statute of mortuaries.

mortalit, n. See mortal.

mortné, a. An erroneous form of morné.

mortorio (môr-tô-ri-ô), n. [It., also morturo, < morto, dead: see mort².] A sculptured group representing the dead Christ.

In the mortorio of the church of San Giovanni Decollato at Modena, the dead body of our Lord lies upon the ground. C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 227.

mortpay, n. [< OF. mortepaye, morte paye; < mort, dead, + paye, pay: see mort² and pay¹.] Dead-pay.

The severe punishing of mort-pay, and keeping back of soulhouse wages. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 101.

mortress (môr'tres), n. [Early mod. mortreux, mortreux, a. See mortress. mort-safe (môr't-sâf), n. [< mort² + safe.] An iron coffin.

Iron coffins, called mort safes, were used in Scotland as a precaution against resurrectionists. After time had been allowed for the wooden coffin to decay, the grave was reopened, and the mort safe taken out for further use. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI, 510.

mortstone (môr't'stôn), n. [< mort² + stone.] A large stone by the wayside between a village and the parish church, on which in former times the bearers of a dead body rested the coffin.

Thi here,

ix furlongs from the chapel. What is this? Oh me! the mortstone.

Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, v. 7.

mortuary (môr'tü-ä-ri), a. and n. [= F. mortuaire = Sp. mortuario = Pg. mortuario = It. mortorio, mortorio, < L. mortuarius, belonging to the dead, ML. neut. mortuarius, also mortuarius, a mortuary, < L. mortuus, dead: see mort².] I. a. Of or pertaining to the burial of the dead. — Mortuary chaplet, a wreath or crown put upon the head of a corpse at the funeral ceremony and often left with it in the tomb. Such a garland was known by the Romans as corollarium. In medieval Europe these wreaths were common, especially in the case of women who died unmarried. They were sometimes made of silver-work with gold and silver wire. — Mortuary chest, a coffin of wood or other material intended to receive the remains of bodies once buried elsewhere, when the graves have been disturbed.

II. n. pl. mortuaries (-riz). 1. In law, a sort of ecclesiastical heriot, a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister of a parish on the death of a parishioner. It seems to have been originally a voluntary bequest or donation, intended to make amends for any failure in the payment of tithes of which the deceased had been guilty. Mortuaries, where due by custom, were recoverable in the ecclesiastical courts.

The curate claimed for burying shots for a mortuary Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 6.

The Payment of Mortuaries is of great Antiquity. It was solemnly done by lauding or driving a Horse or Cow, &c., before the Corps of the Deceased at his Funeral. It was considered as a Gift left by a Man at his Death. The War of Recompence for all Failures in the Payment of Tithes and Oblations, and called a Corse-presentation.

Brown's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 25.

2. A burial-place. Whitlock.—3. A place for the temporary reception of the dead; a dead-house.—4. A memorial of the death of some beloved or revered person; especially, in the seventeenth century, a sword bearing some emblem of the wearer's devotion to the memory of Charles I. and the cause of royalty.

Swords of this type (cavalry sword, time of the Commonwealth) are often called mortuary, as a number of them were made in memory of Charles I., and bear his likeness upon the hilt.

Edynton-Castle, Schools and Masters of Fence, p. 240.

morula (môr'ü-lä), n.; pl. morulae (-lä). [NL., dim. of L. morum, a mulberry: see morr⁴.] In embryol., the condition (resembling a mulberry) of an ovum after complete segmentation of the vitellus or yolk and before the formation of a blastula, when the contents are a mass of cells derived by cleavage of the original and successively formed nuclei; a mulberry-mass of blastomeres or cleavage-cells. See monerula, blastula, gastrula, and gut under gastrulation.

The number of blastomeres thus increases in geometrical progression until the entire yolk is converted into a mulberry-like body, termed a morula, made up of a great number of small blastomeres or nucleated cells.

Morus (môr'rus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. morus, a mulberry-tree: see morr⁴.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees of the apetalous order Urticaceae, type of the tribe Morace; the mulberries. It is characterized by apetalous flowers, the fertile with a 4-parted perianth, and by leaves 3-nerved from the base. The mulberry-fruit is a multiple fleshy fruit formed by the coalescence of many ovaries and in vesting perianths. About 12 species are known, natives of the northern hemisphere and of mountains in the tropics, some are valued for their edible fruit, and some for their leaves, which are used as silkworm-food. See morr⁴.

Morvan's disease. A disease described by Morvan in 1823, characterized by a progressive anesthesia and akinesia, especially of the extremities, accompanied by trophic disturbances, including ulceration and necrosis. The nerves have been found to exhibit an intense inflammation, so that it has been regarded as a multiple neuritis. Also called analgesia parvula and parvula analgesia.

The threads are held firmly by a frame so as to form a dense mass, with the upper ends of the threads presenting a close surface. This surface is secured with a cement, and has a backing of canvas attached, after which a transverse section is cut the desired thickness of the pile, and so on with a number of similar sections.

II. n. 1. Mosaic work; inlaid work, especially in hard materials, as distinguished from inlays of wood, ivory, or the like. The most common materials for mosaic are colored stones and glass, pavements and floors being more commonly made of the former. Glass mosaic is composed either of pieces cut from small colored rods which are prepared in a suitable variety of colors and shades, and for means of which pictorial effects can readily be obtained, as in Roman mosaic, or of tesserae made each by itself, the colors used in this method being fewer and the pieces usually about a quarter of an inch square. The latter variety may be distinguished as Dipylon or Venetian mosaic. Mosaic was a usual decoration among the later Greeks and the Romans, and among the Byzantines and their immediate artistic followers, as at Ravenna and Venice, and in the splendid Norman-Saracenic churches of Sicily, displayed a prominent excellence of design and magnificence of color. The art has recently been revived, with especial success in Italy and France.

The architectural character of mosques varies greatly, according as they occupy free or cramped sites, and as in construction they are original foundations or adaptations of existing buildings. The normal plan of the mosque is rectangular, and includes, besides the covered place of worship proper, an open cloistered court with a fountain for ablutions, and one or more minarets from which the faithful are summoned to prayer at stated hours. The dome, supported on piers, arches, and the arch, usually pointed, of the horseshoe (Saracenic) form, and springing from slender columns, together with elaborate and often splendidly colored surface ornament, mainly geometrical, are features of very frequent occurrence. In the interior the chief deco-tion is found in numerous hanging lamps. The decoration of Moscs is indicated by a niche or recess, sometimes a mere tablet inscribed with verses from the Koran, called family Culexide or gnats, though some members of related families, as Simuliidae, are called mosquitoes, the term being applied in most parts of the world to gnats which have a piercing and sucking proboscis and annoy man. The name is said to have arisen in the West Indies, where it specifically designates Culex pipiens, a gnat streaked with silvery white and having a black proboscis. Mosquitoes are commonly supposed to be especially tropical insects; but they swarm in summer in almost inconceivable numbers in arctic and cold temperate latitudes, as in Labrador, or in the region of the great River of the North, and throughout the moist wooded or marshy regions of British America. They breed in water, and hence are most numerous in marshy and swampy places. The life of the adult insect is very brief, and its natural food is a drop or two of the juice or moisture of plants. See Anopheles and Culex.

In 66, deg. 35. min. they found it very hot, and were much troubled with a stinging fly, called Musquito.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 761.

This summer was very wet and cold (except now and then a hot day or two) which caused great store of mosquitoes and rattlesnakes.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 104.

scientific name Bryozoa. Also, moss-animal, moss-coral, moss-polyp. See Polyzoa.

mossback (mós'bák), n. 1. A large and old fish, as a bass: so called by anglers, in allusion to the growth of seaweed, etc., which may be found on its back. — 2. In U. S. politics, one attached to antiquated notions; an extreme conservative. [Slang.] — 3. In the southern United States, during the civil war, one who hid himself to avoid conscription. [Slang.]

moss-bass (mós'bás), n. The large-mouthed black-bass, Micropterus salmoides, a centrarchoid fish. [Indiana, U. S.]

mossberry (mós'ber'í), n.; pl. mossberries (-íz). See cranberry, 1.

moss-box (mós'boks), n. A kind of huge stuffing-box used in a method of sinking shafts invented by M. J. Chaudron, a Belgian engineer, for preventing water from entering at the bottom of the tubing. It consists of flanged rings arranged to form an annular box, in which moss is placed to form a packing and compressed by the weight of the perpendicular tubing, thus permanently stopping the inflow of water from upper strata which would otherwise descend outside the tubing and enter the pit at the bottom.

mossbunker (mós'bung-kér), n. [Also moss-bunker, mossbunker, mossbunker, mossbunker, mossbunker, mossbunker, mossbunker, etc., and abbr. bunker, in earlier form marshbunker (1679). < D. marshbunker, the seed or horse-mackerel, Clupea trachurus, which annually visits the shores of northern Europe in immense schools, and swims at the surface in much the same manner as the mossbunker—this name being transferred by the Dutch of New York to the fish now so called (it occurs so applied, in the form mossbunk, in a Dutch poem by Jacob Steedman in 1661). The D. marshbunker (Gronovius, 1754) is not in the dictionaries. Its formation is not clear: appar. < marsh, a pebble's pack (or mar, a mass, crowd), & bunk, bank, & -er (see E. -er); prob. in allusion to its appearance in schools.] The menhaden, Brevoortia tyrannus. See cut under Brerortia.

This bay [New York] swarms with fish, both large and small, whales, tunnies, . . . and a sort of herring called the marshbunkers. Dankers and Stapler, Voyage to New York, 1670 (tr. in 1867 [in Coll. Long Island Hist. Soc., I. 100]).

He saw the dnyvel, in the shape of a huge moss-bunker, seize the sturdy Anthony by the leg, and drag him beneath the waves. Irving, Knickerbocker (ed. Trollope), II. 328.

moss-campion (mós'kam'pi-on), n. A dwarf tufted moss-like plant, with purple flowers, Silene acaulis. It is found in high northern latitudes, extending southward on the higher mountains.

moss-capped (mós'kapt), a. Capped or covered with moss.

moss-cheeper (mós'ché'pér), n. The titlark. [Scotch.]

In descending the Urlich hill, I found the nest of a titlark, or moss cheeper. Fleming, Tour in Arran. (Jaimeson.)

moss-clad (mós'klad), a. Clad or covered with moss. Lord Lyttelton.

moss-coral (mós'kór'al), n. Same as moss-animalcule.

moss-crops (mós'krop), n. The cotton-grass, a bog-loving plant. See cotton grass and Eriophorum. [Local, Scotch.]

moss-duck (mós'duk), n. See *duck*².

mossel (mós'el), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of moss.

moss-grown (mós'gron), a. Overgrown with moss.

Shakes the old heldam earth, and topples down Steeples and moss-grown towers. Shak. I Hen. IV., III. 1. 22.

moss-hags (mós'hagz), n. pl. Dead peat, dried up and more or less blown away, or washed away by the run, so as to leave a curiously irregular surface, over which it is hardly possible to walk with safety. [Scotch.]

mosshead (mós'héd), n. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus. [South Carolina.]

The colored women often use a large bunch of "Florida moss," Tillandsia usneoides, as a cushion for the heavy loads they carry on their heads, and I am inclined to believe that mosshead was suggested by this practice, rather than by any direct resemblance to moss in the bird's crest. G. Townsend, Bird Names (1894), p. 76.

mossiness (mós'í-nés), n. The state of being mossy, or overgrown with moss.

moss-locust (mós'ló'kúst), n. See *locust*².

monso (mós'wó), a. [It. pp. of muovere, move: see move.] In mude, rapid: as, pu monso, more rapid; monso monso, less rapid.

moss-owl (mós'oul), n. A dialectal form of moss-owl. [Scotch.]

Fertile Plant of the Moss Rhabdium brachyphylla. a, the capsule with the peristome and styles; b, the capsule with the operculum; c, transverse section of the leaf; d, the apex of the leaf; e, part of the annulus; f, part of the annulus and the peristome, with a few spores above; g, leaf, in the axis of which are to be seen the antheridia and paraphyses; h, antheridium and paraphyses.

merous generally narrow leaves; usually applied to a matted mass of such plants growing together; also, in popular use, any small cryptogamic plant, particularly a lichen: as, moss-pink (mós'pink), n. A plant, Phlox subulata, found on the rocky hills of the central United States, and often cultivated for its handsome pink-purple flowers.

moss-polyp (mós'pól'ip), n. Same as moss-animalcule.

moss-rake (mós'rák), n. A kind of rake used in gathering Irish moss, Chondrus crispus.

moss-rose (mós'roz), n. A beautiful cultivated rose, so named from its moss-like calyx. It is considered a variety of the cabbage-rose.

moss-rush (mós'rúsh), n. An Old World species of rush, growing on peaty land: same as goussacorn.

moss-trooper (mós'tró'pér), n. One of a number of men who troop or range over the mosses or bogs (compare bog-trotter); applied specifically to the marauders who infested the borders of England and Scotland in former times.

A faunted moss trooper, the boy
The truncheon of a spur bestrode,
And round the hall, right merrily,
In mimic foray rode. Scott, L. of L. M., l. 19.

The moss-troopers of Connecticut Loring, Kilckerbocker, p. 306.

moss-trooping (mós'tró'ping), a. Having the habits of a moss-trooper.

A stark moss trooping Scott was he,
As e'er rouchal border lance by knee.
Scott, L. of L. M., l. 21.

moss-wood (mós'wúd), n. Trunks and stumps of trees frequently found in mosses.

mossy (mós'i), a. [Early mod. E. also monsie, and with single s (as in ME. moss), also mossy, mossie, mossie, etc., dial. mossy, mossy; < moss + -y.] 1. Overgrown with moss; abounding with moss.

We are both old, and may be spar'd, a pair
Of fruitless trees, mossie and withered trunks.
Shirley (and Fletcher?), Coronation, ll. 1.

A violet by a mossy stone. Wordsworth, Lary.

The mossy manholes rest
On the tips that have been pressed
In their bloom. O. W. Holmes, The Last Leaf.

2. Like moss. Specifically (a) hairy; rough (b) downy. Levins.

Incipiens barba, a youngie mossie beard. Elgot, 1650.
(a) Moaly (d) Moldy (In these specific senses mostly prov. Eng. or Scotch, and usually maled.)

most (móst), a. and n. [< ME. most, most, < AS. most, most = OE. most, most = D. most = M. most, most = OHG. most, most = G. most = Icel. most = Sw. most = Dan. most = Goth. maists, most; superl. going with more and mo, compare: see more.] 1. a. 1. Greatest in size or extent; largest; superlative of much or much in its original sense 'great', 'large'.

They slept till that it was prime large,
The mole part, but it was Canace.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 354.

Hit were the faynest of forme & of face als,
The most & the myrrest that maketh ever.
Alliterative Poems (E. E. T. S.), ll. 264.

2. Greatest in age; oldest. — 3. Greatest in rank, position, or importance; highest; chief.

Thanne Goddard was alkerlike
Under that the moste wyke (trallor)
That ever in erthe shap was. Havelok, l. 422.

But thou art thy moste Enemy.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 190.

Chose you a wyf in short tyme atte lense
Born of the gentillite and of the mode Of al this lond. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 76.

Felth, hope, & charite, nothing colde;
The mode of hum is charite.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 117.

So both agreed that this their bridle feust
Should for the Gods in Proteus house be made;
To which they all repayrd, both most and least.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. xi. 9.

4. Greatest in amount, degree, or intensity. superlative of much.

Thou hast lore thin cardinals at thi moste nede.
Pleasant Instruction (Child's Ballads), VI. 753.

I had most need of blessing. Shak., Macbeth, II. 2. 32.

5. Greatest in number; numerous beyond others; amounting to a considerable majority; superlative of many; used before nouns in the plural.

Most men will preclain every one his own goodness.
Prov. xx. 4.

He thinks most sorts of learning flourished among them.
P. 26.

For the most part, mostly; principally.
II. n. 1. The greatest or greater number: in this sense plural.

Thou beganst to upbraid the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done. Mat. xii. 23.

He has his health and ampler strength indeed
Than most have of his age. Shak., W. T., IV. 4. 415.

2. Greatest value, amount, or advantage; utmost extent, degree, or effect.

A covetous man makes the most of what he has and can get.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

At most, or at the most, at the utmost extent; at furthest; at the outside.

Within this hour at most
I will advise you. Shak., Macbeth, III. 1. 124.

They [the works of the great poets] have only been read as the multitude read the stars, at most astrologically, not astronomically. Thoreau, Walden, p. 112.

Least and most. See least. To make the most of. See make.

most (móst), adv. [< ME. most, most, < AS. most, adv., orig. neut. of most, a.: see most, a.] 1. In the greatest or highest or in a very great or high degree, quantity, or extent; mostly; chiefly; principally.

Thy sovereign temple wot I most honour
Of any place. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1540.

Women are most fools when they think they're wisest.
Deau and El, Scarful Lady, IV. 1.

Those nearest the king, and most his favourites, were courtiers and prelates. Milton.

He for whose only sake,
Or most for his, such tolls I undertake.
Dryden, Amiel, l. 850.

2. Used before adjectives and adverbs to form a superlative phrase, as more is to form a comparative: as, most vile; most wicked; most illustrious; most rapidly. Like more with comparatives, it was formerly often used superlatively with superlatives: thus, most bodied, dearest, hottest, worst, etc. See more.

For when his semblant in made clere,
Than is he made drike in his thought.
Gower, Conf. Amant, II.

For in the wynter season the fowler speideth not but in the most hardest and coldest weider, whiche is grevous.
Juliana Berners, Treatise of Fysshynge, p. 4.

This was the most unkindest cut of all.
Shak., J. C., III. 2. 187.

Most an-end. See an-end.

-most. [An altered form, by confusion with most, of ME. -most, < AS. -most, a double superl. suffix, < -ma (= L. -mus), as in forma, first, former, + -est (E. -est), as in first, first.] A double superlative suffix associated with -more, a comparative suffix, now taken as a suffixal form of most, as used in forming superlatives, as in foremost, hindmost, uppermost, utmost, inmost, topmost, etc. Compare more.

most¹, mostent, c. Middle English forms of most.

most², a. and n. A Middle English form of most.

mostly (móst'li), adv. For the greatest part; for the most part; chiefly; mainly; generally.

This image of God, namely natural reason, if totally or mostly defaced, the right of government doth cease.
Bacon.

My little productions are mostly satires and lampoons on particular people. Sheridan, School for Scandal, l. 1.

mosto (móst'o), n. [= Sp. mot, mot, < L. mustum; see must.] n. Must; specifically, a preparation used for 'doctoring' wines of inferior quality: same as doctor, o.

mostoury, n. A Middle English form of moisture.

mostwhat (móst'hvot), adv. For the most part.

For all the rest do most what fare amils.
Spenser, Colin Clout, l. 757.

mosy, a. See mossy.

mot¹, n. An obsolete form of motet.

mot² (mot), n. [< F. mot = Pr. mot = Sp. mot, mot = It. motto (> E. motto), a word; motto, < ML. muttum, a word. L. a mutter, a grunt, < L. muttare, mutare, mutter: see mutter.] 1. a. A word; a motto.

God hath not onely graven
On the brass Tables of swift turning Heav'n
His sacred Mot.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Columnes.

2. (F. pron. mó). A saying, especially a brief and forcible or witty saying; a bon-mot. [Recent.]

But, in fact, Descartes himself was author of the mot
"My theory of vortices is a philosophical romance."
Sir W. Hamilton.

mot³ (mot), n. [< ME. mot, mot, < OF. mot, a note of a horn (another use of mot, a word), < L. muttare, a murmur, grunt: see mot².] A note on the bugle, hunting-horn, or the like; also, a note in the musical notation for such instruments.

Streaks of ful stantly many off under
So Gower and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.) l. 1364.

Three notes on this bugle will, I am assured, bring round mot⁴ (mot), n. [See mot¹.] 1. An obsolete or dialectal form of moat. — 2. A mark for players at quoits. Halliwell.

Scott, Ivanhoe, xl.

motacil (mot'á-sil), n. [= F. motacille = Sp. motacilla = Pg. motacilla, < L. motacilla, the white water-wagtail, < motus (with dim. suffix), pp. of movere, move: see more.] The L. word is commonly explained as lit. 'wagtail,' as if irreg. < L. molare, move (freq. of movere, move), + -cilla, assumed to mean 'tail.' A wagtail. See Motacilla.

Motacilla (mó-tá-sil'á), n. [NL., < L. motacilla, the white water-wagtail: see motacil.] A genus of chiefly Old World oscine passerine birds, typical of the family Motacillidae or wagtails. The name has been used with great latitude and little discrimination for many small singing birds of all parts of the world, as the true Sylvicola or Old World warblers, various Mniotiltidae or Old World flycatchers, many of the American Sylvioidae or wood-warblers, and for all the Motacillidae, including the pipits or titlarks of the subfamily Anthinae. It is now restricted to the black-and-white or pied wagtails, as M. alba, of little form, with massed coloration of black, white, and ash, long vibratile tail of twelve weak narrow feathers, pointed wings whose tip is formed by the first three primaries, and whose inner secondaries are long and flowing, and long slender feet without specially lengthened or straightened hind claws. There are many species, widely distributed in Europe, Asia, and other parts of the Old World, one or two of which sometimes straggle to America. Thus M. alba has been found in Greenland and M. ocularis in California.

Motacillidae (mó-tá-sil'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Motacilla + -idae.] A family of oscine birds of the order Passeres, typified by the genus Motacilla; the wagtails. The bill is shorter than the head, straight, slender, acute, and notched; the primaries are nine in number; the inner secondaries are lengthened; the feet are long and slender, with acutellate tarsi and usually long and straightened claw; and the tail is usually as long as the wings. The Motacillidae are small insectivorous birds of terrestrial habits, resembling larks (Alaudidae) in some respects, but widely separated by the lamplike coloration of the plumage. Two subfamilies are generally recognized, Motacillinae and Anthinae, or wagtails proper and pipits or titlarks.

Motacilline (mó-tá-sil'i-né), n. pl. [< Motacilla + -inae.] 1. The Motacillidae as a subfamily of some other family, as Sylviidae. — 2. A subfamily of Motacillidae. It contains the wagtails proper as distinguished from the pipits or Anthinae, having the point of the wing formed by the first three primaries, the tail as long as the wing or longer, and the coloration either pied with black and white or varied with yellow and green. There are some 50 species, chiefly of two leading genera Motacilla and Anthinae. See wagtail.

motacilline (mó-tá-sil'in), a. Pertaining to or resembling the Motacillinae.

motation (mó-tá'shon), n. [< L. motatio(n), < L. mutare, keep moving, freq. of movere, move: see more.] The act of moving; mobility. Bailey, 1734.

motatorious (mó-tá-tó'ri-us), a. [< L. motator, a mover, < L. mutare, pp. mutatus, move: see motation.] Vibratory; mobile; said of the legs of an insect or arachnid which, on alighting, has the habit of moving them rapidly, keeping the body in a constant state of vibration. This habit is found especially among certain long-legged spiders and crane-flies.

Motasilite (mó-tá-sil'i-té), n. [From an Arabic word meaning 'to separate.' One of a numerous and powerful sect of Mohammedan heretics, who to a great extent denied predestination, holding that man's actions were entirely within the control of his own will. They held extremely heretical opinions with reference to the quality or attributes of Allah. They appeared a few generations after Mohammed, and became one of the most important and dangerous sects of heretics in Islam.]

mot¹ (mót), n. [Formerly also moat; < ME. mot (dat. mot), < AS. mot, a particle, atom, = D. mot, dust; cf. D. moet, a knob, speak, mark; Sp. mot, a buff in cloth. Cf. moat.] 1. A small particle, as of dust visible in a ray of sunlight; anything very small.

As thikke as motes in the sonne-beams.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 12.

Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye?
Mat. vii. 3.

These Kels did lie on the top of that water, as thick as motes are said to be in the sun.
J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 126.

2. A stain; a blemish.

Note ne spot is non in the.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 703.

3. An imperfection in wool. — 4. The stalk of a plant. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] — 5. A match or squib with which, before the introduction of the safety-fuse, it was customary to ignite the charge in blasting.

mot² (mót), n. [< ME. mot, mot (pret. moete), < AS. motan (pres. mót, pret. máste; not found in inf.) = OS. motan, pres. mót = OFries. pres.

United States to a similar mixture.

motion

Thi lathre seyde as myche ther agoyne as he dar do to 71 hyr gode molershep Puston Letters, I. 258.

motility (mo-ti-l'i-ti), n. [= F. motilité = Pg. motilidade, < L. as if motilita* (t-)s., < motilis*,

Ay, but to die and go we know not where:
To lie in cold obstruction and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become

A kneaded clod. Stat., M. for M., M. 1. 120.

10. Inclination; disposition; impulse; will; as, of one's own motion.

In 16 Edw. IV, 1475, . . . (the Ignoraveres) . . . "of their free motion and will have bounden thyme and they re- craft perpetually to kepe . . . upon Corpus Christi day a pageant . . ." (Council Book III, fo. 20 v.)

York Plays, Int., p. xxvii.

11. Proposal; instigation; incitement.

Then he said to his cardinals, Sirs, make you redy, for I will to Rome. Of that motion his cardinals were sore ashamed and displeased, for they loved not the Romaynes.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I, cccxvi.

Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream.

Shak., J. C., II, I, 64.

12. A proposal or proposition formally made; specifically, a proposal formally submitted in a deliberative assembly, with a view to its discussion and adoption; also, the act of submitting such a proposal: as, the motion to appoint a committee was carried.

The motion about setting forth y^e fishing ship (called y^e Friendship) came first from y^e plantation Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 286.

Valentine and Hollis held the Speaker down in his seat by main force, and read the motion amidst the loudest shouts.

Meredith, Nugent's Hampden.

13. In law: (a) An application to a court or judge, usually in the course of a legal proceeding. Whatever is asked of a court by a suitor is asked by a motion. (b) More narrowly, an application which is incidental to the progress of a cause, as distinguished from the trial or investigation of the issue; as, a motion for an injunction; a motion to open a default. Still further distinctions are made in common parlance. Thus, applications on the trial incidental to its progress, such as to strike out testimony or to grant a non-suit, are called motions, though, being on the trial, and the result being included in the judgment, they are not motions within the rules regulating the formalities required for making motions. The record of the decision, the award of costs, or the mode of review. (c) In some of the United States, the paper drawn up by the attorney of the moving party, saying, "now comes the plaintiff (or defendant)," etc., "and moves," etc. (much in the same way that an application to the court would be entered in the minutes), and filed with the clerk in advance of applying to the court, and usually also served on the other party.—14. In music: (a) The melodic change of a voice or voice part from one pitch to another; melodic progression. It is concrete, conjoint, or compound when it consists of a single step, discrete or disjoint when of a skip. (b) The melodic progression of any two voice-parts in harmonic writing in relation to each other. It is similar when both voice-parts rise or fall at the same time, parallel when they together rise or fall by the same interval, contrary or opposite when one rises and the other falls, oblique when one rises or falls while the other remains stationary, and mixed when all varieties occur at once in several parts. In general, between important or conspicuous parts contrary motion is sought. Parallel motion in perfect fifths or octaves is regularly forbidden, and similar motion to a perfect fifth or octave is employed sparingly.

15. In the fine arts, the change of place or position which, from the attitude represented, a figure is portrayed as making. It can only be implied from the attitude which prepares the subject for the given change, and therefore differs from action.

16. In med., evacuation of the intestine; alvine discharge.

Shall I lose my doctor? no, he gives me the potions and the motions.

Shak., M. W. of W., III, I, 105.

17. In milit. tactics, one of the stages into which each movement prescribed in the manual of arms is divided to facilitate instruction.

—Absolute motion, change of absolute place. —Accelerated motion. See accelerate. —Active motion, in physiology, motion of the limbs or other parts of the patient produced by his own action. In contradistinction to passive motion, where the limbs are moved by the attendant. —Angular motion. See angular. —Brunonian motion. Same as Brunonian movement (which see under Brunonian). —Center of motion. See center. —Oiliary motion. See iliary. —Consensual motions. See consensual. —Contrariety of motion. See contrariety. —Differential motion. See differential. —Direct motion. (a) In astronomy, increase in the longitude of a star. (b) In music. See direct. —Disjunct motion. See disjunct. —Diurnal motion of a planet, elliptic motion, equable motion. See the adjectives. —Energy of motion. See energy. —Equation of motion. See equation. —Focus of mean motion, of true motion. See focus. —Harmonious motion. See harmonious. —Heart-motion, in spinning, winding, and analogous machines, a motion produced by means of a heart-shaped cam. —Hourly motion, the space moved through by a heavenly body in an hour. —Hourly motion, in astronomy, the change of position which takes place in an hour. —Inferential, irrotational motion. See the adjectives. —Lateral motion, in a railroad-car, the end-play or freedom of movement of an axle in its boxes or the freedom of movement between a spring-holster and a track. —Laws of motion, specifically, Newton's three laws of motion, which are as follows: First Law. Every body continues in its state of rest, or uniform motion in a straight line, except so far as it may be compelled by force to change that state. Second Law. Change of motion is proportional to force applied, and takes place in the direction of the straight line in which the force acts. Third Law. To every action there is always an equal and contrary reaction; or, the mutual actions of any two bodies are always equal, and oppositely directed. —Line of motion. See line. —Local motion. See local.

Lost motion, in mechanics, any difference of motion between the driving parts of a motor and the driven machine, or between the parts of a machine that communicate motion from one to another. It results from faulty construction of the parts, or from looseness of the boxes of axles or shafting or of a belt, which is thus permitted to slip.

Natural motion, an involuntary movement of the body, as the beating of the heart. —Overhead motion, a mechanism, consisting of counterweights and speed pulley arrangements of gears or of other contrivances, for increasing speed or force, interposed between some prime mover or main line of power-transmission and a machine with which it communicates. It is so called because for convenience in transmission, or that it may not occupy working space, it is placed over the machine affected by it. Also called overhead work. —Paracentric motion, motion to or from an attracting center. —Parallel motion. (a) See parallel. (b) In astronomy. See del. 14 (b). —Passive motion. See under active motion. —Perpetual motion. (a) A machine which should do work without exhausting any power of doing work—that is, its work must not be accompanied by any displacement (such as the fall of a weight or the uncoiling of a spring) or transformation (such as the combustion of fuel) which could not be undone by a replacement or counter transformation without the expenditure of as much work as the machine has done. Such a machine is impossible, and contrary to all experience; for power of doing work is never increased nor diminished. Nevertheless, very many pretended perpetual motions have been put forth by deluded or knavish inventors. Most of them are of two classes. 1st, those which depend upon gravity or magnetism, and 2d, those which depend upon centrifugal force or other pressure mistaken for moving power. (b) The mode of motion of such a machine. (c) By a popular abuse of the term, a movement or machine which could go on indefinitely by its own self-generated power. Thus, if a man should pretend to have a wheel which turned upon its bearings without resistance, so that it would go on moving indefinitely, or to have a fluid which, though viscous, was frictionless, so that its motion, though continually decreasing, never came to rest, neither claim would be a claim to a perpetual motion, nor (however unfounded) would it violate any fundamental principle of mechanics. On the other hand, a machine (such as has actually been proposed) which would not go on moving of itself forever, but would require a little external force to overcome friction, but which with that little force should be capable of doing an indefinite amount of work, would, properly speaking, be a perpetual motion. —Positive motion, in mechanics, an arrangement of apparatus connecting related parts of a machine in such manner that, as one moves, the other must move in accordance with the law of the relation. For example, the system of gearing which takes motion from the lathe-spindle, and imparts motion to the lead screw of a lathe, is a positive motion. On the other hand, any mechanism which moves a part of a machine in a manner that permits the possibility of some subsequent motion, or variation of the motion, or the part, through the action of any force not directly transmitted by such mechanism, is not positive. Examples of motions not positive are: the mechanism actuating a tilt hammer, which falls by its gravity; a spring which by its elasticity recoils; and pulleys driven by its line in which the motion may be varied through slip. —Positive-motion loom. See loom.

Primary motion, the diurnal motion of a fixed star. —Proper motion, in astronomy, that apparent motion of a star, or velocity of a fixed star which is due to a real movement of the star itself relatively to the other stars. —Quantity of motion, momentum, the sum of the velocities of all the particles each multiplied by the mass.

Rectilinear, parabolic, or circular motion, motion in a rectilinear, parabolic, or circular path. —Relative motion, change of relative place. —Retrograde motion, in astronomy, decrease in the longitude of a star. —Rotational motion. See rotary motion. —Secondary motion, the proper motion of a fixed star. —Simple harmonic motion, a motion like a uniform motion round the circumference of a circle which is looked at, exspecta "when a point Q moves uniformly in a circle the perpendicular QP drawn from its position at any instant to a fixed diameter AB of the circle intersects the diameter at a point P, whose position changes by a simple harmonic motion." Thomson and Tait. —Slide-valve motion, in a steam engine, the valve gear; any one of a great variety of devices for imparting to a slide-valve its proper motion for induction out of, and exhaust and compression, or unloading of steam at the end of the piston stroke. Specifically, the motion of a slide-valve produced by the valve gear. The link-motion is one of the most important of valve gears. In the majority of slide-valve motions the primary movement is derived from an eccentric keyed to the crank shaft. In other cases a motion is taken from the cross head. In the Joy valve gear the primary movement is obtained from the connecting-rod. See valve motion, rod of eccentric, eccentric, and valve gear. —Take-up motion, in looms, the mechanism which takes up and winds the weft beam on the cloth beam as fast as the warp is unwound from the warp beam. The name is also given to analogous mechanism in many other kinds of machinery. —Violent motion, in older writers, a motion imparted upon a body by an external force. —Voluntary motion, motion resulting from an act of will, in contrast with reflex action or motion. —Syn. Motion, Movement, Move. Motion may be considered separate from that which moves, movement is always connected with the person or thing moving. Hence we speak of the laws of motion; of rest as a mode of motion; and of perpetual motion, not of movement in any of these cases; hence, also, motion is the more scientific and technical term. Motion is more general and more voluntary; movement, more particular and occasional.

hence we speak of a motion with the hand; a movement of troops; involuntary movements; the movements of the heavenly bodies; the rate of motion or of movement. The figurative uses of the two correspond to the literal. The chief uses of move are founded upon the idea of moving a place, in chess or a similar game, for winning the game.

motion (mō'shon), v. [ME. mozionen; < motio, n.] I. trans. 1. To guide by a significant motion or gesture, as with the hand or head: as, to motion a person to a seat.—2. To propose; move.

Here's Gloucester, a foe to citizens,

One that still motions war and never peace.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI, I, 2, 62.

II. intrans. 1. To make a significant movement or gesture, as with the hand or head: as, to motion to one to take a seat.—2. To make a proposal; offer plans. [Rare.]

Richard Stratton told me that whill he was in scoryne with Whethyll, John Redde neyghed hym onys myche after this tenent, etc.

Paston Letters, III, 158.

Well hast thou motion'd, well thy thoughts employ'd.

Milton, P. L., I, ix, 220.

motional (mō'shon-əl), a. [< motion + -al.] Of or pertaining to motion, characterized by (certain) motions; specifically applied to particular imitative diseases exhibiting peculiar muscular actions, as tartarism.

motion-bar (mō'shon-bär), n. In a steam-engine, a guide-bar or rod. F. H. Knight.

motion-distortion (mō'shon-dis-tör'shon), n. A distortion of a line of a spectrum due to relative motions of the parts of the source of light.

motioner (mō'shon-er), n. [< motion + -er.] A mover.

Without respects of any worldly reward or thanks, to reforme the fault and increase of his labours to God the mercifull, the author, and the worker of all goodness.

Cadell, To Queen Catherine.

motion-indicator (mō'shon-in-dik-ä-tör), n. An apparatus for showing the speed or the number of revolutions of any machine or part of a machine in a given time. It differs from a counter in that the latter merely registers movement, independently of time.

motionist (mō'shon-ist), n. [< motion + -ist.] One who makes a motion.

Milton (uses) motionist. F. Hall, Psalms Philol., p. 87.

motionless (mō'shon-less), a. [< motion + -less.] Without motion; being at rest.

motion-man (mō'shon-man), n. An exhibitor of a puppet-show. See motion, n., 6.

And travel with young Joane the motion-man.

H. Jonson, New Inn, I, 1.

motivate (mō'ti-vät), v. t.; pret. and pp. motivated, pp. motivating. [< motive + -ate.] To motive; set as a motive or as the inciting cause of; induce.

The expulsions from Southern Russia have not been motivated by any new circumstances.

American Hebrew, XXXVI, 28.

motivation (mō'ti-vä'shon), n. [< motivate + -ion.] The act or manner of motivating; the act or process of furnishing with an incentive or inducement to action.

motive (mō'tiv), a. and n. [L. a. = Sp. Pg. It. motivo, < ML. motivus, serving to move, motivus, < L. motus, pp. motus, move; see move.] II. n. < ME. motif, < OF. motif, F. motif = Sp. Pg. It. motivo, < ML. motivum, a motive, moving cause, ment of motus, serving to move; see I.] I. a. Causing motion; having power to move some one or something; tending to produce motion.

Great acts, even in spiritual things, are less perceived and less motive than particular ones.

J. C. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 67.

Motive power or force. (a) The whole power or force acting upon any body or quantity of matter to move it. (b) Moving or impelling force in a figurative sense.

Such men as Spencer are not sent into the world to be part of the motive power.

Lynch, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 168.

(c) That which moves, as a locomotive, in railroading, the locomotives collectively of a railroad, as, the superintendant of the motive power.

II. n. 1. A mental state or force which induces an act of volition; a determining impulse; specifically, a desire for something; a gratification contemplated as the final cause of a certain action of the one desiring it. The term motive is also loosely applied to the object desired. The noun motive in this sense was brought into general use by writers influenced by Hobbes though he uses the adjective only, who held that men's actions are always governed by the strongest motive, and denied the freedom of the will. It is now, however, in common literary and conversational use apart from any theory.

What moves the mind, in every particular instance, to determine its general power of directing, to this or that particular motion or rest? And to this I answer, the motive for continuing in the same state or action is only the present satisfaction in it; the motive to change is always some uneasiness.

Lack, Human Understanding, II, xxi, § 29.

Without another life, all other motives to perfection will be insufficient.

By. Atterbury, sermons, I, xi, Pref.

By motive, I mean the whole of that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition, whether that be one thing singly, or many things conjunctly.

Richards, On the Freedom of the Will, I, 2.

When the effect in tendency of a pudore is to determine a man to forbear to act, it may seem improper to make use of the term motive, since motive, properly speaking, means that which disposes an object to move. We must, however, use that improper term, or a term which, though proper enough, is scarce in use, the word determinative.

Bandium, Introit, to Morals and Legislation, x, 3, note.

2. The design or object one has in any action; intention; purpose; the ideal object of desire. The conversion of the heathen was the motive to the settlement.

Bancroft, Hist. I, 3, 1, 20.

We must measure morality by motives, not by deeds.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 2, 4.

3. One who or that which is the cause of something; an originator.

It hath fated her to be my motive
And helper to a husband.

Shak., All's Well, iv, 4, 20.

Not are they living
Who were the motives that you first went out.

Shak., T. of A., v, 4, 27.

4t. Movement.

Her wanton spirits look out
At every joint and motive of her body.

Shak., T. and C., iv, 5, 57.

5. Prevailing design. Spectacularly (a) In motive, same as subject. (b) In the fine arts (1) the prevailing idea in the mind of an artist, to which he endeavors to give expression in his work; or (2) a subject or example prominently characteristic of any work or part of a work, and elaborated or often repeated with more or less variation.

The Panathenaic procession furnished Phidias with a series of sculptural motives, which he had only to express according to the principles of his art.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 218.

6t. Motion; proposition.

Such motives that move this mistress in her glory,
And make men in myribles that muse motion on her worlds.

Piers Plowman (B), l, 113.

Leading motive. See leading. - Syn. 1. Motive, Reason, Inducement, Incentive, Impulse, consideration, prompting, stimulus. The difference among the first five of these words are suggested by the definitions. A motive is that which moves one to act, addressing the will, as though directly, and determining the choice. It is the common philosophical term, and may be collective; as, the whole field of motives. A reason is that which addresses the rational nature by way of argument for either belief or choice. An inducement leads one on by his desire for good as to hold out an additional inducement. An incentive urges one on like martial music. An impulse drives one on, but is transitory.

motive (mō'tiv), v. t.; pret. and pp. motived, pp. motiving. [< motive, n.] To act on as a motive, or with the force of a motive; prompt; instigate. [Recent.]

When he has satisfied himself . . . that it was made by such a person as he, so armed and so motived, . . . the problem is solved.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 10.

motiveless (mō'tiv-less), a. [< motive + less.]

Having no motive or aim; objectless. Though inconceivable, a motiveless volition would, if conceivable, be conceived as morally worthless.

Sir W. Hamilton.

motivelessness (mō'tiv-less-ness), n. The character of being motiveless.

That calm which (Iwendolen had promised herself to maintain had changed into sick motivelessness.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxiv.

motivity (mō'tiv-ity), n. [< motive + -ity.] The power of moving; form of motion or locomotion.

The active power of moving, or, as I may call it, motivity. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xxiii, 28.

motley (mō'tli), n. and a. [Formerly also motley; < ME. motteloge, mottelay, motteler, mottle, a mixture of colors, a party colored dress; of uncertain origin. According to Skeat, < OF. mottelle, elotted, curdled, cf. equiv. mattonne, curdled, < mottes, curds, < G. dial. (Bav.) mott, curds; but the sense does not suit. In meaning the word motley is like medley; but the forms disagree. The supposed derivation from W. maddie, a changing color < madd, change, + die, a stain, hue, and that from W. ysmot, a patch, spot, do not suit the conditions. Hence mottelle I, n. 1. A habit made of pieces of cloth of different colors in glaring contrast; the usual dress of the jester or professional fool.

A worthy fool! motley's the only wear!

Shak., As you like it, II, ii, 1

Hence - 2. A jester; a fool.

Will you be married, motley?

Shak., As you like it, III, ii, 3.

3. Any mixture, as of colors.

With notes to each and all, interlarding the pages into a motley of patchwork.

D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days at Edgewood

A motley of white and gray on the head, neck, shoulders, and back.

Amer. Nat., May, 1880, p. 440.

Man of motley, a man dressed in motley; a fool.

Never hope.

After I cast you off, you men of motley.

Fletcher, Wit without Money, III, 4.

II. a. 1. Party-colored; variegated in color; consisting of different colors; as, a motley coat.

Lapence and after-thought, and idle care.

And doubts of motley hue, and dark despair.

Dryden.

2. Composed of or exhibiting a combination of discordant elements; heterogeneous in composition; diversified.

Inquire from whence this motley style

Dit first our Roman partly defile.

Tragedy, I, of Persius's Satires, l, 158

Motley color, in ceram, a kind of metallic luster given to some kinds of English pottery, in the seventeenth century and later, by dusting them with powdered lead and manganese.

motley (mō'tli), v. t. [< motley, n. cf. mott-]. To variegate; give different colors to.

The course of the holy lakes he bade,

With thousand dyes he motley all the meads.

Spectator, I, of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, Eden.

motley-minded (mō'tli-mind'ed), a. Having a mind or character like that of a professional fool or clown; exhibiting incoherence in thought; having thoughts of a motley character.

This is the motley-minded gentleman.

Shak., As you like it, v, 4, 41.

motly, n. and a. An obsolete spelling of motley.

motmot (mō'tmōt), n. [Also momot; said to be so named from the bird's note, which sounds like mot-mot, slowly repeated.] A bird of the family Momotidae or Prionituridae; a sawbill. These birds are peculiar to America, inhabiting tropical and subtropical forests, and ranging north nearly or quite to Texas. The average size is about that of the Jay, to which they have some superficial resemblance, but they are more like the bee-eaters of the Old World. Momotidae having a slender form, with long tail, and which the middle feathers project beyond the rest and are spatulate, forming a kind of racket. The bill is serrate, the coloration is variegated, chiefly greenish and bluish. These birds are of solitary habits, like kingfishers, to which they are closely related; they feed upon reptiles, insects, and fruits. See cut under Momotus.

moto (mō'tō), n. [It. = Pg. moto, < L. motus, motion; see motus.] In music: (a) Motion; the direction in which the harmonic parts move; as, moto contrario (contrary motion). See motion, 14. (b) Energetic or spirited movement; spirit; as, con moto (with spirited movement).

motograph (mō'tō-grāf), n. [< L. motus, motion, + Gr. γραφω, write.] A form of telegraph or telephone-receiver, invented by Edison, depending for its action on the variation of the friction between two conductors in relative motion, when a current of electricity is passed from one to the other across the surface of contact. A revolving drum is interposed in the circuit, one of the electrical connections being made through a movable contact in contact with the surface of the drum. This contact point is connected to a recording lever or to a telephone diaphragm, and, in consequence of the variations of the friction produced by the electric currents, causes the lever to record, or the diaphragm to repeat, the message.

motographic (mō'tō-grāf'ik), a. [< Motograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the motograph.

There are models of . . . the automatic and motographic telegraph, the motograph translator and repeater.

Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XIV, 3.

moton, n. An obsolete form of motion.

moton (mō'tōn), n. [OF. (Fr.).] A piece of armor of the fifteenth century, forming part of the defense of the arm and shoulder. Perhaps (as thought by Meyrick) it was a gusset for the armpit.

motoner, n. See motunner.

motophone (mō'tō-fōn), n. [< L. motus, motion, + Gr. φωνη, voice.] A sound-engine actuated by aerial sound waves, invented by Edison. Vibrations of a diaphragm, produced, as in the phonograph, by sound waves, are converted into motion of rotation by a stylus and ratchet wheel.

motor (mō'tōr), n. and a. [< F. moteur = Sp. Pg. motor = It. motore, a motor, < L. L. motor, one who moves, applied to one who rocks a cradle, < L. movere, pp. motus, move; see move.] I, n. 1. One who or that which imparts motion; a source or originator of mechanical power; a moving power, as water, steam, etc.

These bodies likewise, being of a congruous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their motor.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II, 2.

Specifically - 2. In mach., an operator or a quantity which represents the displacement of a rigid body. It involves the designation of a particular fixed space, and the association with it of a length and an angle.

This is in complete analogy with his (Clifford's) introduction of the word motor to embrace the species vector and wrench.

The Academy, June 22, 1880, p. 402.

3. In mach., a prime mover; a contrivance for developing and applying mechanically some natural force, as heat, pressure, weight, the tide, or the wind; a machine which transforms the energy of water, steam, or electricity into mechanical energy; as, an electric motor. See machine, 2-4. A motor-car. - 5.

In anat., specifically, a motor nerve. - Atm. motor. (a) A machine driven by compressed air. Such machines are constructed like steam-engines, and use the air expansively or non-expansively, according to the character of the engine. They are, strictly speaking, heat-engines, in which the heat naturally existing in air, or this in connection with heat derived from the work of compression, is converted into outer work. When the air is used expansively, the expansion is regulated by cut-off valve-gear, as in a steam-engine. Expansion is, however, not generally so available as with steam, on account of the chilling of the air during the period of expansion and consequent freezing of precipitated aqueous vapor, which clogs the valve-ports with ice, and seriously interferes with the working of such engines. This difficulty is avoided by heating the air prior to its induction to the cylinder of the engine, but, except in the so-called caloric engine, this principle has not been widely adopted. See caloric engine (under caloric), ice-machine, and cut under air-engine. (b) A motor-car driven by an air-motor. - Domestic motor, a small motor used for pumping water, or running a sewing-machine, etc. - Electric motor. See electric. - First motor, a prime motor. - Hydraulic motor. See hydraulic. - Motor oculi, the third pair of cranial nerves, giving motor impulse to most of the muscles of the eye. Also called oculomotor. See second cut under brain.

II. a. 1. Giving motion; imparting motion.

Ascription throws away a great power given by God to help and improve us. It abandons to evil what might be a vast motor force leading to good.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 302.

2. In physiol., conveying from the center toward the periphery an impulse that results or tends to result in motion, as a nerve; opposed to sensory. - 3. Of or pertaining to or acting through the motor nerves or tracts.

A vigorous motor system, ready to act, and to act energetically, is a condition of a rapid development of will.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 128.

Motor dynamo, a dynamo used as a motor. When a dynamo is being driven by another the driver is sometimes called the motor dynamo. Motor nerve, any nerve whose function is to excite muscular contraction, and thus effect movement in an animal body. Most nerves are of mixed character, or sensorimotor, effecting both motion and sensation. See sensorimotor. Motor printer, a printing telegraph in which the mechanism is moved by electric steam, or other motive power.

motor-car (mō'tōr-kār), n. A car which carries its own propelling mechanism, as an electric motor, pneumatic engine, steam-engine, etc., and is therefore a locomotive. Many such cars have sufficient power to draw other cars attached to them.

motor-cycle (mō'tōr-sī'kl), n. A bicycle driven by an electric or other motor; an automobile bicycle.

motorial (mō'tō-ri-āl), a. [< L. motorius, motory (see motory), + al.] Of or pertaining to motion; specifically, of or pertaining to a motor nerve; motor, as a nerve; as, motorial nerve-fibers; a motorial impulse.

motorium (mō'tō-ri-um), n.; pl. motoria (-i). [NL. < L. motorius, the power of motion, neut. of motorius, moving; see motory.] That part of an organism which moves or is moved, as distinguished from that which feels, senses, or perceives; the opposite of sensorium. Since a sensorium has no determinable physical location, the motorium is the entire physical organism. Motorium commune, a hypothetical common center in the brain for motor impulses.

motorius (mō'tō-ri-us), n.; pl. motorii (-i). [NL. < L. motorius, moving; see motory.] In anat. and physiol., same as motor, 4. - Motorius oculi. Same as motor oculi or oculomotor. More fully called nervus motorius oculi.

motorman (mō'tōr-man), n. One whose business it is to drive a motor-car, or automobile vehicle. [Recent.]

motorpathic (mō'tōr-path'ik), a. [< motor-path-y + -ic.] Of or belonging to motorpathy or the movement-cure; kinesiotherapeutic.

motorpathy (mō'tōr-pā'thi), n. [Irreg. < L. motor, a mover (see motor), + Gr. παθω, πάθος, suffering; see pathos.] In med., the movement-cure; kinesiotherapy.

motory (mō'tō-ri), a. [= Pg. motorio, < L. motorius, moving, < L. motor, mover; see motor, n.] Same as motor or motorial.

mott, n. An obsolete preterit of mete.

mott, n. An obsolete form of mott.

mottelery, n. and a. An obsolete form of motley.

mottetto (mō'tet'tō), n. [It. = motet.] Same as motet.

motile (mot'li), v. t.; pret. and pp. mottled, pp. mottling. [< motley, taken as "mottly."] To mark with spots or blotches of different colors or shades of color; blotch; variegate; cloud.

Rough grotesque
Mottle with many shades the orchard a slope.
Southey, Roderick, xv.

mottle (mot'li), n. [< mottle, v.] The pattern or arrangement of spots and cloudings forming a mottled surface, especially in marble or in the natural veining of wood.

mottled (mot'ld), p. a. 1. Spotted; variegated; marked with blotches of color, of unequal intensity, passing insensibly into one another.

The strong peculiarity of Harvey's style: . . . thought pressed on thought, sparkling with imagery, mottled with learned allusions, and didactic with subtle criticism.
J. D. Parnell, Amer. of Lit., II, 111.

Bliss the mottled little legs of that there precious child (like Canterbury brown, his own dear father says).
Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xlix.

Specifically—2. In entom., marked with irregular spots, generally formed of hairs of a different color from the ground; having two or more colors irregularly mingled in spots, but not running into one another.—3. In metal., an epithet noting the appearance of pig-iron when in a stage intermediate between the stages designated as the white and the gray. In mottled iron the whiter parts of the metal are disseminated through the gray, so that the whole has a spotted or mottled appearance. The grayest iron contains the largest amount of graphite carbon; the whitest iron the least graphite and the most combined carbon.—Mottled calf. See calf.

mottle-faced (mot'li-fast), a. Having a mottled face.

The mottle-faced gentleman spoke with great energy and determination Lockwood, Pickwick, xlii.

mottling (mot'ling), n. [Verbal n. of mottle, v.] 1. Variegation of a surface by irregular spots.—2. pl. In entom., the marks of a mottled surface.

motto (mot'o), n.; pl. mottos or mottos (-oz). [< It. motto (= F. mot), a saying, motto: see mot².] 1. A short pithy sentence or phrase, sometimes a single word, used to indicate the tenor of that to which it is attached (as an essay or a treatise), or adopted as expressive of one's guiding idea or principle, or appended to a device or a coat of arms. In heraldry the motto is carried on a scroll, alluding to the bearing or to the name of the bearer, or expressing some principle or tenet. The heraldic motto, strictly considered, is not hereditary but personal, but it is frequently used by successive bearers of the escutcheon to which it belongs, especially when, as is often the case, it refers to some part of the achievement. 2. The poetry or verse contained in a motto-kiss or paper cracker.

Then we let off paper crackers, each of which contained a motto.
W. S. Gilbert, Ferdinand and Elvira.

3. A motto-kiss. [U. S.] Motto indention. See indention.

mottled (mot'ld), a. [< motto + -ed².] Having a motto; bearing a motto: as, a mottled scroll.

motto-kiss (mot'o-kis), n. A candy or sweetmeat wrapped in fancy paper and having a scrap of love-poetry or a motto inclosed with it, used for the amusement of children. In the United States called motto simply.

mottramite (mot'ram-it), n. [< Mottram (see cop²) + -ite².] A hydrous vanadate of lead and copper occurring as a crystalline incrustation of a velvet-black color on sandstone at Mottram in Cheshire, England.

motty (mot'i), a. [< mot¹, mot², + -y¹.] Containing notes. [Scotch.]

The motty dun-reck raised by the workmen mo (mō), n. A Scotch form of mouth.
H. Miller.

mouch (mouch), v. t. [Also mouch; var. of muck¹, q. v.] 1. To skulk; sneak; move slowly and stupidly. See muck¹. [Slang.]

These hedge fellows are slow and dull—they mo mouch along as they were croaking themselves.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I, 472.

2. To live a sort of semi-vagabond life, without a fixed place of abode, selling water-cresses and other wild produce. See mouch². [Slang.] moucharaby (mō-shar'ā-bi), n. [F.] In arch.: (a) A balcony inclosed with latticework in a customary Oriental fashion, in such a manner that a person upon it can see the street without being seen. Also called lattice-window. See cut under lattice-window. (b) A balcony with a parapet and with machicolations, often embattled, projecting from the face of a wall over a gate, to contribute to the defense of the entrance. See cut in next column.

Moucharaby. Colaba-Cath. East. Ind. 4 Wight

mouchard (mō-shar'), n. [F., a police-spy; < mouch², a fly, spy, esp. a police-spy: see mouch².] In France, a police-spy.

mouche (mōsh), n. [F., a fly; < L. musca, fly: see Musca.] A patch worn as an ornament.

moucher (mōsh'er), n. [Var. of muck².] 1. One who mouches; same as muck².—2. One who lives a semi-vagabond life, selling water-cresses, wild flowers, blackberries, and other things that may be obtained in country places for the gathering. [Slang.]

The moucher sells the nests and eggs of small birds to townfolk who cannot themselves wander among the fields, but who love to see something that reminds them of the green meadows. As the season advances and the summer comes he gathers vast quantities of dandelion leaves, parsley, sow-thistle, clover, and so forth, as food for the thousands of tame rabbits kept in towns.
Pall Mall Gazette.

6. In civil engin., in excavations, a piece of the original ground left at intervals to show the depth. Indian mounds, earthworks erected by the aborigines of North America, the so-called mound-builders. They are especially numerous in that part of the United States which lies between the Great Lakes, on the north and the Gulf of Mexico on the south, and is bounded on the west by the States lying the western bank of the Mississippi river, and on the east by a line drawn through the middle of the States of New York and Pennsylvania and extending southward as far as to include the greater part of the two Carolinas and the whole of Georgia and Florida. Some of these works are very extensive and of varied character, consisting of mounds of earth, of other materials, or of earth and stone, which inclose areas of great size, and not infrequently are accompanied by vaults and deep ditches. Thus the work at Newark, Ohio, covers an area of two square miles and consists of a network of hillocks and lines of circumvallation. So far as is known, some of these works were used as burial places, and as the sites of rude dwellings and camps, others were intended, no doubt, for purposes of defence and others, again, may have been connected in some way with religious rites and ceremonies. Many of them were situated on the river valleys, and not a few of the most prominent ones in the Mississippi valley occupy sites once taken up by them.

I cannot the assertion that not only has there not, as yet been anything taken from the mounds indicating a high stage of development than the red Indian is known to have reached, but that even the mounds themselves, mountain-ash (moun'tân-ash'), n. 1. One of several small trees of the genus Pyrus, having ash-like leaves, primarily P. aucuparia. This, the rowan-tree or quick beam, grows wild in the northern parts of the old World, and is in general cultivation for ornament, on account of its handsome pinnate leaves, its small but numerous corymbed white flowers, and its bright-red berries. The wood is used for tools; the berries afford malic acid, and all parts of the tree, as also of the American species, are astringent. The best-known American mountain-ash is P. americana, a similar tree, but with larger leaves, and smaller though deeper-colored fruit. It is native to the mountains of the eastern United States and northward, and is also cultivated. The western mountain-ash, P. canadensis, is a not very different tree, extends across the continent. See doberberry, 2, and ice-ash. 2. mountain-chain (moun'tân-čan), n. A connected series of mountains or conspicuous elevations. In the formation of mountains other than volcanic, the process has usually been of such a character that a long strip of country has been raised in a sort of crest or wall. Indeed, regions thousands of miles in length have occasionally been thus affected. This elevated ridge or wall has either in the original process of mountain-building been raised into masses or subdivisions of varying height and more or less isolated from each other, or else long continued erosion and exposure to atmospheric agencies have brought about the same result. The more or less separated and distinct peaks, summits, or crests together make up the range. It is impossible to establish any criterion by which one mountain range can be separated from another adjacent one. In most cases, however, there is more or less similarity, if not absolute identity, between the different parts of a range from both a geological and a topographical point of view; but there are ranges which are made up of parts differing from each other greatly in lithological character and in the epoch of their formation, and which, nevertheless, are always popularly considered as forming one system, and are so designated: this is the case with most of the greater mountain-chains, as the Himalayas, the Andes and the Cordilleras.

mountain-cock (moun'tân-kok'), n. The male capercaillie, Tetrao urogallus.

The oral opening or ingestive aperture of an animal, of whatever character and wherever situated: the os, or oral end of the alimentary canal or digestive system. The mouth is in the head in most animals, and serves for taking in food, mastication, deglutition, and the utterance of the voice. In nearly all vertebrates the mouth is composed of upper and lower jaws and associated parts, and consequently opens and shuts vertically; in many the orifice is closed by fleshy movable lips, and the cavity is furnished with teeth and a tongue. Appropriate salivary and mucous glands moisten the interior, which is lined with epithelium. In most invertebrates, as the enormous assemblage of arthropods, the basis of the mouth is clearly seen to be modified limbs, and the jaws work sidewise. In other cases the mouth, though definite in position and character in each case, varies too widely to be defined excepting as the ingestive orifice. In protozoans any part of the body may act as a temporary mouth; and in many worms there is never any mouth or special digestive system, food being absorbed directly through the integument. The most complicated mouths are found among insects and crustaceans (see cut under mouth part). See os, stoma, and cuts under medusiform, Actinostoma, Haliphysma, anthozoid, Aurelia, and house-fly.

mowburn (mō'bern), v. t. To heat and ferment in the mow through being placed there before being properly cured; said of hay or grain. Not only the straw, but the seed or kernel is injured by mowburning, this greatly impairing the nutritive value of hay or grain, and unfitting grains for malting.

mower (mō'er), n. [< ME. mowere, mower, < AS. māwerc, < māran, mow; see mow and -er.]

1. One who mows.

And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
And the mower whets his scythe.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 68.

2. A mowing-machine. Front-out mower, a mowing-machine in which the cutting mechanism is in front, and the team or power which impels it is behind. Except for clover-hedders and lawn-mowers, this arrangement has not been much used in modern machines. Also called propeller-mower.

mower (mō'er), n. [< mow + -er.] One who mows, mocks, or makes grimaces.

mowing (mō'ing), n. [Verbal n. of mow, v.]

1. The act of cutting with a scythe. — 2. Land from which the crop is cut.

"And be off lying in the mowing, like a patridge, when they come after ye. That's one way to do business," said Hepay.

H. B. Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin, p. 27.

Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prob. 2.

mowing (mō'ing), n. [< ME. mowage; verbal n. of mow, v.] Grimacing; mawking.

mowing-machine (mō'ing-mā-shēn'), n. A machine for mowing grass. The terms mowing-machine, harrower, and reaper are in a measure interchangeable. While essentially the same machine, the mowing machine or mower is used for cutting grass and clover, and the reaper for cutting grain. Both mowers and reapers, more properly the latter, are harvesters. The mowing-machine is essentially a vehicle fitted with some form of gearing for transmitting the motion of the axle to a set of reciprocating knives. An arm projects from the vehicle and carries a series of palm or finger-like guards, in and between which play a series of hand-adapted knives. This bar is made to travel close to the ground while the shearing action of the row of reciprocating knives between the guards mows down the grass. A track cleaver or wing at the end of the bar guides the cut grass toward the machine, so that a clean track will be formed for the tread wheel at the next passage of the mower in the field. Mowers have one driving-wheel or two, and either a fixed and rigid cutter-bar or, more often, a bar hinged so that it can be turned up out of the way when not in use for mowing.

Mozarabic (mo-zar'ab-ik), n. [< Mozarab + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mozarabs; as, Mozarabic Church, architecture, liturgy, etc. Mozarabic liturgy, Mozarabic mass, the ancient national liturgy of the Spanish church. In its present form, which shows some assimilation to the Roman mass, this liturgy was revised and revised by Cardinal Ximenes in A. D. 1502, and is still in use in the chapel of a college at Toledo founded by him, and in a few other chapels or churches. The Roman liturgy was made compulsory in Spain, with the exception of a few churches, about A. D. 1100, and in the thirteenth and succeeding centuries the national liturgy had fallen into almost entire disuse. The inappropriate epithet Mozarabic that is, 'Arabizing' may have been given to this liturgy from its longer retention in that part of Spain which was held by the Moors, or may have been meant as an unfavorable reflection upon it by the friends of the Roman rite. Apart from obvious Roman insertions, this liturgy is found to agree with some of the early Spanish councils, especially that of Toledo in A. D. 682, and with an account of the Spanish liturgy given by St. Isidore of Seville at about the same date. The Mozarabic liturgy closely resembles the Gallican liturgy, homologous with them to the Ephesine, Gallican, or Hispano-Gallican group of liturgies, and, as the only full and complete extant member of that group, serves as its type and representative. Among the marked peculiarities of this liturgy are: (1) the nature, arrangement, and unequal variability of its parts, (2) its Oriental affinities, such as remains of the epiclesis, proclamations by the deacon, the position of the pax, the presence of the Sancta Sanctis, etc.; (3) the elaborate ritual of the fraction, and (4) the use of a peculiar nomenclature for the parts, considerably different even from that of the Gallican uses, as, for instance, offertorium for intuit, meritorium for offer, tor, torium, oration for prayer, etc. See Ephesian, Gallican. Mozarabic office, the office for the canonical hours according to the ancient Spanish rite, as given in the breviary published by Ximenes in A. D. 1502.

Mozarabic rite, the Mozarabic office and liturgy.

mucigen (mū'si-jen), n. [< muc(u) + -gen, producing.] A clear substance secreted by the cells of mucous membranes and of certain glands, and which becomes converted into mucus.

mucigenous (mū-sij'e-nus), a. [< L. mucus, mucus, + -genus, producing; see -genous.] Same as muciparous.

Out of the breeding-season none of these mucigenous cells are to be found in the kidneys. Nature, XXIX. 168.

mucilage (mū'si-lāj), n. [< F. mucilage = Sp. mucilago = Pg. mucilagem = It. mucellagine, mucilagine, mucilage, < L.L. mucilago, mucilago (-gu-), a moldy, musty juice, < L. mucere, be moldy or musty; see mucid, mucus.] 1. Moldiness; mustiness; rottenness; a slimy mass.

The hardest seeds corrupt and are turned to mucilage and rottenness, . . . yet rise again, in the spring, from putrefaction and a solid substance. Evelyn, True Religion, I. 106.

2. Gum extracted from the seeds, roots, and bark of plants. It is found universally in plants, but much more abundantly in some than in others. The marsh-mallows root, tubers of orchids, the bark of the lime and elm, the seeds of quinces and flax, are examples of plant-products rich in this substance. In the arts the name is applied to a great variety of sticky and gummy preparations, some of which are merely thickened aqueous solutions of natural gum, which is easily extracted from vegetable substances by hot water; while others are preparations of dextrine, glue, or other adhesive materials, generally containing some preservative substance or compound, as crocus or salicylic acid.

3. In chem., the general name of a group of carbohydrates, having the formula C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁. The mucilages have the common property of swelling enormously in water, so that they are in a condition near to solution, leaving no jelly-like mass as many gums do. Members of the group differ greatly in properties, some being closely related to the gums, others to cellulose. Their chemical constitution is not yet determined. Animal mucilage. Same as mucus. Mucilage-canal. A special mucilage-secreting passage or canal observed in many plants as those traversing the parenchyma of the pith and cortex of the Marattia, the stems of the Cyperaceae, the posterior side of the leaves of some species of Lycopodium, etc. Mucilage-reservoir. Same as mucilage-canal.

mucilage-cell (mū'si-lāj-sel), n. An individual cell secreting mucilage, as those which occur in various ferns, mosses, etc.

mucilage-slit (mū'si-lāj-slit), n. In bot., in the Anthocerot, a slit on the under surface of the thallus, with no special guard-cells, and leading like a stoma into an intercellular space filled with mucilage. Göebel.

mucilaginous (mū'si-lāj'i-nus), a. [< F. mucilagineux = Sp. Pg. mucilaginoso = It. mucellaginoso, mucilaginoso, < L.L. as if 'mucilaginosis, < mucilago; see mucilage.] 1. In anat., muciparous; secreting a glairy or viscid substance like mucus; specifically applied to synovial membranes, certain of whose fringed vascular processes were called mucilaginous glands by Clopton Havers in 1691. [Obsolete.]—2. This day I did first wear a muffle, being my wife's last year's muffle. Pepys, Diary, Nov. 20, 1662. (Eng. Hist.)

2. A boxing-glove.

Just like a black eye in a recent muffle

(For sometimes we must box without the muffle).

Byron, Don Juan, II. 92.

3. Same as muffler (v.)—4. A cover or wrap, especially one used to deaden sound.

Yesterday morning he sent for the officer on guard, and ordered him to take all the muffles off the drums.

Greville, Memoirs, July 18, 1820.

5. In chem. and metall., an arched vessel, resisting the strongest fire, made to be placed over crucibles and tests in the operation of assaying, to preserve them from coming in contact with fuel, smoke, or ashes though at the same time of such a form as not to hinder the action of the air and fire on the metal, nor prevent the inspection of the assayer.

In the coppling of a fixed metal, which, as long as any lead or dross or any alloy remains with it, continueth still melting, flowing, and in motion under the muffle.

Huurd, Poly of Metals, p. 145. (Daries.)

6. A small furnace with a chamber in which pottery or porcelain painted with metallic colors is baked or fired.—7. A pulley-block containing several sheaves. E. H. Knight, Hard muffle-colors. See hard muffle-painting, ceramic decoration by painting which will not bear the heat of the porcelain-furnace, but is glazed or fixed at the lower temperature of the muffle. Painting upon enamel, whether the enamel is applied upon metal or a ceramic paste, is of this nature. Muffle-painting is divided into two kinds—hard muffle-painting, or demi grand feu, and ordinary or soft muffle painting.

muffle (muf'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. muffled, ppr. muffling. [< ME. muffelen, conceal (the face); cf. D. muffelen, conceal, puffer; from the noun (see muff 1, n.); perhaps in part confused with muffle 2, v.] 1. To infold or wrap up, especially in some cloth or woven fabric, so as to conceal from view or protect from the weather; wrap up or cover close, particularly the neck and face; envelop or wrap up in some covering.

As though our eyes were muffled with a cloude.

Gautier, Choruses from Jocasta, III.

The face lies muffled up within the garment.

Addison, Cato, IV. 3.

Wolcott (Peter Pindar), The Remonstrance. (Daries.)

mugget (mug'et), n. [Also mugget, mugget; < F. muguet, woodruff.] A name applied to various plants, especially to the woodruff (Asperula odorata) and the lily-of-the-valley.

mugginess (mug'jē-ness), n. The state of being muggy.

muggins (mug'inz), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A children's game of cards played by any number of persons with a full pack divided equally among the players. Each one in turn places a card face up in a pile in front of him, and if the top card of one player matches with the top card of some other player, that one of the two who first cries "Muggins!" adds his card to the pile of the other. This continues until all the cards are placed in one pile - the player who owns this being the loser. 2. A game of dominoes in which the players count by fives or multiples of fives. Each player putting down a domino with 5 or 10 spots on it, or one with such a number of spots as, united with those on the dominoes at either or both ends of the row, make 5 or a multiple of 5, adds the number so made to his score. The player first reaching 200 if two play, or 150 if more than two, wins the game.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 27.

Mugil (mū'jil), n. [L., a mullet; see mullet.] The leading genus of Mugilidae; the mullets.

Mugilidae (mū'jil-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mugil + -idae.] A family of percussive fishes, typified by the genus Mugil; the mullets. (a) In Bonaparte's system, same as Mugilidae. (b) In recent systems restricted to mugiliform fishes with only 24 vertebrae and rudimentary or very weak teeth, and in this sense accepted by nearly all modern authors. There are about 80 species, of 7 or 8 genera, mostly inhabiting tropical or subtropical regions either in salt or fresh water; but several extend much farther, both north and south. Two at least are common in British waters, and two others abound along the Atlantic coast of the United States. None occur on the Pacific coast north of southern California. Most of the Mugilidae feed almost entirely upon the organic matter contained in mud. The mud is worked for some time between the pharyngeal bones, which are peculiarly complicated; the indigestible parts are then ejected, and the rest is swallowed. See cut under mullet.

mugiliform (mū'ji-li-fōrm), a. [C. L. mugil, a mullet, + forma, form.] Having the form of a mullet; resembling the Mugiliformes.

Mugiliformes (mū'ji-li-fōrm'ēz), n. pl. [NL.; see mugiliform.] Günther's eleventh division of Acanthopterygii. It includes Mugilidae, Atherinidae, and Sphyrrenidae.

mugiloid (mū'ji-lōid), a. and n. [C. L. mugil, a mullet, + (Gr. εἶδος, form.) I. a. Mugiliform; of or pertaining to the Mugilidae or Mugiloides. II. n. A mugiloid or mugiliform fish. Agassiz: Sir J. Richardson.

Mugiloides (mū'ji-lōid'ē-s), n. pl. [NL.; Cuvier's eleventh family (in French Mugiloides) of Acanthopterygii, comprising forms with the ventral fins abdominal or subabdominal in position, two dorsal fins, and small teeth. It included the Mugilidae, Tetragynuridae, and Atherinidae of subsequent nomenclature.

muga, mugas (mugz), n. pl. [Origin obscure.] The Teeswater breed of sheep. [Scotch.]

mugweed (mug'wēd), n. [Perhaps corruption, simulating weed, of mugget; see mugget.] The crosswort, Galium cruciatum. Also golden mugweed.

mugwort, n. See mugget.

mugwort (mug'wōrt), n. [Also dial. (-w.) muggart, muggin; < ME. mugworte, corruptly mugward, < AS. muggeort, muggeort, a plant, Artemisia vulgaris, < mug, myg, midge, + wort, plant.] The plant Artemisia vulgaris; also, sometimes, A. linalthum. In the United States the western mugwort is A. ludoviciana, the leaves as in A. vulgaris, white tomentose beneath. East Indian mugwort, Cymbopogon citratus, related to Artemisia. West Indian mugwort, Parthenium hysterophorus.

mugwump (mug'wump), n. and a. [Algonkin mugwump, a great man, chief, captain, leader; used in Eliot's translation of the Bible (1661) to render the E. terms captain, duke, centurion, etc.] I. n. 1. An Indian chief; an Indian leader. said to have been used among the Indians and whites of Massachusetts and Connecticut in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. 2. (a) A person of importance; a man of consequence; a leader. In this sense long in local use along the coast of Massachusetts and the Connecticut shore of Long Island Sound. Hence—(b) A person who thinks himself of consequence; a self-important man; a humorous or satirical use of the preceding. In this sense the word was also long in local use as above, and occasionally appeared in print (as in the Indianapolis "Sentinel," in 1872, and the New York "Sun," March 23d, 1894).

The great Mugwump is Democratic (Locofoco) candidate for county commissioner) was delivered of a speech upon the occasion, which was highly applauded by the great "Doctor Duns-never."
Tippencanoe Log Cabin Sunder, May 29, 1840 (a later edition, dated July 4, 1840) issued "from the office of the 'Great Western'"

[In a "song" following the above in the "negro" dialect, the same person is referred to as "de mug," and "honest, honest, mugwump even."]

Then the great mugwump in Democratic (Locofoco) candidate for Congress was delivered of a speech which the faithful loudly applauded.
Solon Robinson, editorial in the "Great Western," (Lake Co., Ind., July 6, 1840).

We have yet to see a Blaine organ which speaks of the Independent Republicans otherwise than as Pharisees, hypocrites, dukes, mugwumps, traitors, embezzlers, or something of that sort. New York Evening Post, June 20, 1894.

The educated men in all the university towns . . . are in open revolt now . . . We presume they can be partially disposed of by calling them free-traders—all educated men are free-traders, it seems—and if any of them hold out after that, they can be called mugwumps.

The Nation, July 31, 1894, p. 61.

3. [cap.] In U. S. polit. hist., one of the Independent members of the Republican party who in 1884 openly refused to support the nominee (June 6th) of that party for the presidency of the United States, and either voted for the Democratic or the Prohibitionist candidate or abstained from voting. The word was not generally known in any sense before this time, but it took the popular fancy, and was at once accepted by the Independents themselves as an honorable title. [U. S. political slang in this sense and the next.]

4. In general, an independent.

For that large class of people, natural mugwumps—who regard the right of property as far above those of persons, economy seems commendable.
The American, XVI. 227.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a mugwump (in sense 2 (b)).

The faithful forty-seven (Locofoco voters) would do well to be careful how they follow the lead of this mugwump coun.
Solon Robinson, editorial in "Great Western," (Lake Co., Ill., Aug. 4, 1840).

[See also note following the first quotation under 1, 2 (b).]

2. Of or pertaining to a political mugwump (in sense 3 or 4).

mulberry (mul'ber-i), n. and a. [ME. mulberry, moorberry, prob. < AS. mōrberie (not recorded, but cf. mōrbedm, mulberry tree; the AS. form mōrberie, often cited, is erroneous) = D. moerberie = Lti. moerba = OHG. mōrberi, mōrberi, MHG. mulbere, mulbere, mulbere, mulbere = Sw. mulbar = Dun. moorbar, mulberry, the mulberry-tree, < *mōr, ME. more, < L. mōrum, < Gr. μύρον, moion, a mulberry; L. morus, Gr. μῆλον, a mulberry-tree; see more and berry.] The dissimilation of the first r to l is due to the following r.] I. n.: pl. mulberries (-iz). 1. The berry-like collective fruit of the mulberry-tree.—2. Any tree of the genus Morus. The black mulberry, M. nigra, native somewhere in western Asia, has been known in Europe from antiquity. It yields a pleasant dark-colored fruit, and its leaves were formerly in extensive use for feeding silkworms. The white mulberry, M. alba, introduced from China much later, has almost superseded the black in silkworm-culture. It has been to some extent introduced into the United States. The red mulberry, M. rubra, a native of the United States, is the largest species of the genus. Its wood, which is very durable in contact with the soil, is used for posts, and for cooperage, ship and boat-building, etc. Its leaves are less valued for silk-production than those of the other species, but its fruit is excellent. The Mexican mulberry, extending into Texas, etc., is M. microphylla.

Black Mulberry (Morus nigra).

3. One of several plants of other genera.—4. In embryol., a mulberry-mass or mulberry-germ; a morula. See cut under gastrulation.—Dwarf mulberry. See knulberry and cloudberry.—French mulberry. See Callicarpa.—Indian mulberry. A small tree, Morinda citrifolia. mule (mul'), n. (Early mod. E. also moil, moyle; < ME. mule, muile, < OF. mule, F. mule = Sp. Pg. It. mulo = AS. mul = D. mul = OHG. mül, MHG. mul, mule = Lecl. müll = Sw. mula = Dan. mule; also, in comp., D. mullezel = MHG. mülle-sel, G. mülle-sel = Dan. mulle-sel = Sw. mulle-sel (D. ezel, etc., ass; see ass); MHG. multier, G. maul-tier = Dan. multier (OHG. MHG. tier, G. thier, Dan. dyr, beast, = E. deer); < L. mulus, a mule. The E. mule does not come from the AS. mul, which would give a mod. form moel* (cf. owl, < AS. ule); it depends on the OF. or the orig. L.] 1. A hybrid animal generated between the ass and the horse. The cross is usually between a jackass and a mare, that between a stallion and a she-ass being called a Mang. The mule is a valuable product of artificial selection, in some respects superior to either parent, and is extensively bred in America (Kentucky, Missouri, Mexico, etc.), in Spain, in Polton (France), etc. It retains to some extent the specific characters of the ass, in the comparatively large head, long ears, roached mane, slim tail, and narrow, pointed hoofs, but acquires much of the size, strength, and symmetry of the mare. The animal matures slowly, is very long-lived, little liable to disease, and able to do more work than a horse under hard treatment and poor fare. Being also very agile and sure-footed, it is serviceable as a pack animal in countries where a horse could scarcely be used. The mule is not less docile and intelligent than the horse, and its strength is, in proportion to its size, probably greater. Mules are ordinarily incapable of procreation, and such seems to be always the case with the jack, but instances of impregnation of the hinny by the male ass or by a stallion are not rare.

They drew out of dromedaries diverse lordes,
Moyles mylke white, and mervailous bestes,
Ellydes, and Arralyes, and clyfautes nobles,
Ther are of the Oryent, with honourable kynges.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 2287.

So is the mule, whose punch being full with sucking, she Kisses her dam.
Dekker, Taich Pole's Masque (1613).

2. A hybrid in general; a mongrel; a cross between different animals.

No certain species, sure; a kind of mule
That's half an ethnic, half a Christian.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, II. 1.

3. The scap-duck, Fuligula marila. Rgr. C. Nedracon. [Prov. Eng.]—4. In bot., a plant or vegetable produced by impregnating the pistil of one species with the fecundating element of another; a hybrid.

Several mules have been produced between the species of this genus (Verbascum).
London.

5. In spinning, a machine invented by Samuel Crompton (completed 1779), in which the rotations are delivered from a series of sets of drawing-rollers to spindles placed on a carriage which travels away from the rollers while the thread is being twisted, and returns toward the rollers while the thread is being wound; so named because it was a combination of the drawing-rollers of Arkwright and the jenny of Hargreaves.—6. In numis., a coin, token, or medal which, owing to mistake or enprize, consists of two obverse or two reverse types, or of which the obverse and reverse types are accidentally associated. Thus, a denarius having a head of Tiberius on each side, or a denarius having the head of Tiberius on the obverse and a reverse type struck from one of the coin dies of Augustus, would be a mule.

The encouragement given to the creation of new varieties (of English tradesmen's tokens in the eighteenth century) by combining obverse and reverse dies that had no real connection was satirized by a token bearing the reverse type of an ass (that is, a token-collector) and mule saluting each other, (and) having for the legend "Be assured, friend mule, you shall never want my protection." The very appropriate term mule was ever after applied to these illegitimate varieties.
T. Sharp, Cat of Chetwynd Coll. of Tokens, p. iv.

7. A slipper without heel-piece or quarter.—8. The foot of a wine glass.—9. A disease in horses.

mullet (mul'et), n. [< ME. mullet, mulot, < OF. mullet, F. mulot, a mullet, dim. of melle, < L. mullus, the red mullet; see Mullet.] 1. A fish of the genus Mugil or of the family Mugilidae. (Of the true mullets the genus Mugil is the type. The characteristics are: a nearly cylindrical body covered with large scales; six branchiostegial rays; head convex above; the scales large, the muzzle short; an angular rise in the middle of the lower jaw, which fits into a corresponding hollow in the upper; and ciliiform teeth. The best known species is the common gray mullet or great mullet (M. cephalus), found round the shores of the British islands and in particular abundance in the Mediterranean. It grows to the length of from 12 to 30 inches, and exceptionally to nearly 3 feet. It is of a bottle-green color on the back, light on the sides, which are marked with longitudinal bands, and of a silvery white underneath. It frequents shallow water, and in spring and early summer often ascends rivers. It has the habit of rooting in the mud or sand in search of food. Another species, also known as the gray mullet (M. cephalus), a native of the Mediterranean, is distinguished by having its eyes half covered by an adipose membrane. It weighs usually from 10 to 15 pounds, and is the most delicate of all the mullets. A smaller species, the thick lipped gray mullet (M. chelo), is common on the British coast. Many other species, natives of the Mediterranean, India, and Africa, are much esteemed as food.

multidimensional (mul-ti-di-men'shon-al), a. [L. multus, many, + dimensio (-s-), dimension: see dimension, dimensional.] In math., of more than three dimensions; n-dimensional.

Only mathematicians can work out systems of non-Euclidean geometry, or of multidimensional space.
R. A. Proctor, Gentleman's Mag., (XIV, 38)

multifaced (mul-ti-fāst), a. [L. multus, many, + facies, face, + E. -ed.] Having many faces, as certain crystals; presenting many different appearances.

multifariet, a. [L. multifarius, manifold: see multifarious.] Same as multifarious.

As though we went into the land of France
 Ten thousand people, men of good pumance,
 To werro into her hindring multifarie.
Hall's Voyages, I, 107.

multifarious (mul-ti-fā'-ri-us), a. [= Sp. multifario, L. multifarius, manifold, L. multus, many, + -farius = Gr. -faios, quiverbus, √ pa, show, appear. Cf. bifarius.] 1. Having great multiplicity; of great diversity or variety; made up of many differing parts.

Mau is a complex and multifarious being, integrated of body and soul.
Sp. Parker, Platonick Philos., p. 7.

2. In bot. and zool., arranged in many rows or ranks.—3. In law (of a pleading in equity), combining in the same bill of complaint distinct and separate claims of distinct natures or affecting different persons not connected therein, which ought to be made the subject of separate suits. As the objection is founded on the inconvenience of trying together diverse matters, what is to be regarded as multifarious is largely discretionary with the trial court.

multifariously (mul-ti-fā'-ri-us-li), adv. In a multifarious way; with great diversity.

multifariousness (mul-ti-fā'-ri-us-ness), n. The state or quality of being multifarious; multiplicated diversity.

multiferous (mul-tif'-e-rus), a. [= F. multifer = Sp. multifero, L. multifer, fruitful, L. multus, much, + ferre = E. bear.] Bearing or producing much or many. Bailey, 1731.

multifid (mul-ti-fid), a. [= F. multífido = It. multífido, L. multífidus, many-cleft, L. multus, many, + fidere, √ fid, cleave: see fission.] Having many fissions or divisions; cleft into many parts, lobes, or segments, as certain leaves; chiefly a zoological and botanical term.

multifidous (mul-tif'-i-dus), a. [L. multífidus: see multifid.] Same as multifid.

multifidus (mul-tif'-i-dus), n.; pl. multífidi (-dī). [NL., L. multífidus, many-cleft: see multifid.] In anat., one of the muscles of the fifth or deepest layer of the back, consisting of many fleshy and tendinous fasciculi which pass obliquely upward and inward from one vertebra to another, the whole filling the groove between the spinous and transverse processes from the sacrum to the axis; more fully called the multífidus spinus, and also fidispinalis.

multiflagellate (mul-ti-flaj'-e-lāt), a. [L. multus, many, + flagellum, whip: see flagellate.] Possessing many flagella, or whip-like appendages: correlated with uniflagellate, bi-flagellate.

multiflorous (mul-ti-flō'-rus), a. [= F. multiflora = Sp. It. multiflora, L. multiflorus, abounding in flowers, L. multus, many, + flor (-or-), a flower: see flower.] Many-flowered; having many flowers.

multiflue (mul-ti-flū), a. [L. multus, many, + E. flue.] Having many flues, as the boiler of a locomotive. [A trade use.]

multifol (mul-ti-fol), a. and n. [L. multus, many, + folium, a leaf: see foli.] 1. a. In arch., decoration, etc., having more than five foils or arcuate divisions: as, a multifol arch. 2. n. Multifol ornament.

In his architecture the tracery, scroll-work, and multifol bewilders us, and divert attention from the main design.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 352.

multifold (mul-ti-fōld), a. [L. multus, many, + E. -fold.] Many times doubled; manifold; numerous.

multiform (mul-ti-fōrm), a. and n. [= F. multiforme = Sp. Pg. multiforme = It. multiforme, L. multiformis, many-shaped, L. multus, many, + forma, form.] 1. a. Having many forms; highly diversiform; polymorphic.

Air, and ye elements, the eldest birth
 Of Nature's womb, that in quaternion run Perpetual circle, multiform and mix
 And nourish all things. Milton P. L., v, 182.

Multiform aggregates which display in the highest degree the phenomena of Evolution structurally considered.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 30.

Multiform function, a function such that within a given area of the variable the latter can pass continuously through a cycle of values so that when it returns to its original value the function shall have a different value from that which it had at first. Also called non-uniform function.

2. n. That which is multiform; that which gives a multiplied representation or many repetitions of anything.

The word suits many different martyrdoms,
 And signifies a multiform of death.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, III.

multiformity (mul-ti-fōr-mi-ti), n. [= OF. multiformite = Sp. multiformidad = Pg. multiformidade, L. multiformitas (-s), L. multus, many, + forma, shape: see multiform.] The character of being multiform; diversity of forms; variety of shapes or appearances in one thing.

From that most one God flows multiformity of effects;
 And from that eternal God temporal effects.

If we contemplate primitive human life as a whole, we see that multiformity of sequence rather than uniformity of sequence is the notion which it tends to generate.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 486.

multiformous (mul-ti-fōr-mus), a. [L. multiform + -ous.] Same as multiform. [Rare.]

His multiformous places compell'd such a swarm of suitors to him about him.
Sp. Hacket, Alp. Williams, I, 284. (banes.)

multiganglionate (mul-ti-gang'-gli-on-āt), a. [L. multus, many, + (L. L.) ganglion, a tumor: see ganglion.] Having many ganglia. Huxley.

multigenerate (mul-ti-jen'-e-rāt), a. [L. multus, many, + generatus, pp. of generare, generate: see generate.] Generated in many ways.

Multigenerate function, in math., a function not homogeneous.

multigenerous (mul-ti-jen'-e-rus), a. [L. multigenus, also multigenus, of many kinds, L. multus, many, + genus (gener-), kind: see genus.] 1. many kinds; having many kinds.

multigranulate (mul-ti-gran'-ū-lāt), a. [L. multus, many, + granulum, a grain: see granulate.] Having or consisting of many grains.

multigyrate (mul-ti-jī'-rāt), a. [L. multus, many, + gyrus, a circle, circuit, ring: see gyrate.] Having many gyres or convolutions; much convoluted, as a brain.

multijugate (mul-ti-jō'-gāt), a. Same as multijugous.

multijugous (mul-ti-jō'-gus), a. [L. multijugus, multijugis, yoked many together, L. multus, many, + jugum, yoke.] In bot., consisting of many pairs of leaflets.

multilaminate (mul-ti-lam'-i-nāt), a. [L. multus, many, + lamina, a thin plate of wood: see laminate.] Having many layers or laminae.

multilateral (mul-ti-lāt'-e-rāl), a. [Cf. F. multilatère = Sp. multilátero = Pg. multilátero = It. multilatero; L. multus, many, + latus (later-), side: see lateral.] 1. In math., having more lines or sides than one. Hence—2. Generally, many-sided.

The whole poem represents the multilateral character of Hinduism.
J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, III, 8.

multilinear (mul-ti-lin'-e-ār), a. [L. multus, many, + linea, a line: see linear.] Same as multilinear.

multilobate (mul-ti-lō'-bāt), a. [L. multus, many, + NL. lobus, a lobe, + -ate: see lobate.] Having many lobes; consisting of several lobes.

multilobed (mul-ti-lō-bēd), a. [L. multus, many, + NL. lobus, a lobe, + -ed.] Having many lobes or lobe-like parts; multilobate.

multilobular (mul-ti-lōb'-ū-lār), a. [L. multus, many, + NL. lobulus, lobule: see lobular.] Having many lobules.

multilocular (mul-ti-lōk'-ū-lār), a. [= F. multiloculaire = Pg. multiloculare = It. multiloculare, L. multus, many, + loculus, a cell, + -ar: see locular.] Having many cells, chambers, or compartments; as, a multilocular pericarp; a multilocular spore; a multilocular shell. See plurilocular.—Multilocular crypt. See crypt.

multiloculate (mul-ti-lōk'-ū-lāt), a. [L. multus, many, + loculus, a cell, + -ate.] Same as multilocular.

multiloquence (mul-ti-lō'-kwens), n. [= It. multiloquenza, L. multus, many, + loquens, a talking, loquens (-s), pp. of loqui, speak, talk: see loquation.] Use of many words; verbosity; loquacity.

multiloquacious (mul-ti-lō'-kwent), a. [L. multus, much, + loquens (-s), pp. of loqui, speak.] Speaking much; very talkative; loquacious.

multiloquous (mul-ti-lō'-kwus), a. [= Sp. multiloquo = Pg. multiloquo = It. multiloquo, L. multiloquus, talkative, L. multus, much, + loqui, speak, talk.] Same as multiloquent.

multiloquy (mul-ti-lō'-kwī), n. [= Pg. multiloquio = It. multiloquio, multiloquio, L. multiloquium, talkativeness, L. multus, much, + loqui, speak, talk.] Same as multiloquence.

multimillionaire (mul-ti-mil-yon-ār), n. [L. multus + E. millionaire.] One who possesses property worth several millions of dollars (or pounds, or francs, etc.).

multinodal (mul-ti-nō'-dāl), a. [L. multus, many, + nodus, knot: see nodal.] Having many nodes, in any sense of that word.

multinodate (mul-ti-nō'-dāt), a. [L. multus, many, + nodus, knot: see node.] Same as multinodal.

multinodous (mul-ti-nō'-dus), a. [L. L. multinodus, multinodis, having many knots, L. multus, many, + nodus, knot: see node.] Same as multinodal.

multinomial (mul-ti-nō'-mi-ni-āl), a. and n. [= Sp. It. multinomio, L. multus, many, + nomen, a name: see nomen, nomen. Cf. binomial.] Same as polynomial. Multinomial theorem, an extension of the binomial theorem.

multinomial (mul-ti-nōm'-i-ni-āl), a. [L. multus, many, + nomen (nomin-), name: see nomen.] Same as multinominous.

multinominous (mul-ti-nōm'-i-nus), a. [L. L. multinominus, many-named, L. multus, many, + nomen (nomin-), name: see nomen.] Having many names or terms; multinominal; polyonymous.

Venus is multinominous, to give example to her prodigal discipline.
Donne, Paradoxes.

multinuclear (mul-ti-nū'-kle-ār), a. [L. multus, many, + nucleus, a kernel: see nuclear.] Same as multinucleate.

multinucleate (mul-ti-nū'-klē-āt), a. [L. multus, many, + nucleus, a kernel: see nucleate.] Having many or several nuclei, as a cell. Engel, Brit., XXIV, 125.

multinucleated (mul-ti-nū'-klē-ā-tēd), a. Same as multinucleate.

multinucleolate (mul-ti-nū'-klē-ō-lāt), a. [L. multus, many, + nucleolus, dim. of nucleus, a kernel: see nucleolate.] Having many or several nucleoli.

multiovalate (mul-ti-ō'-vā-lāt), a. [L. multus, many, + ovulum, ovule: see ovule.] In bot., containing or bearing many ovules.

multiara (mul-ti-p'-ā-rā), n.; pl. multiara (-rā). [NL., fem. of multiarus: see multiarus.] In chatet, a woman who has had two or more children, or who, having had one, is parturient a second time: opposed to primipara.

multiarity (mul-ti-par'-i-ti), n. [L. multi-para + -ity.] Plural birth; production of several at a birth.

multiparous (mul-ti-p'-ā-rus), a. [= F. multipara = It. multipara, NL. multiparus, giving or having given birth to many, L. multus, many, + parere, bear.] 1. Producing many at a birth.

Creatures that are feeble and timorous are generally multiarous.
Ray, Works of Creation, p. 138.

2. In bot., many-bearing: said of a cyme with three or more lateral axes (the pliochastium of Eichler).

multipartite (mul-ti-pār'-i-ti), a. [= F. multipartis = It. multipartito, L. multipartitus, much-divided, L. multus, much, + partitus, pp. of partire, divide, L. pars (part-), a part: see part, v. Divided or cleft into many parts; having several parts; multifid.

Multilobed.—Window of Apollon Chapel, Rheims Cathedral, France; 13th century.

multiplied, multipede (mul'ti-ped, -péd), a. and n. [= F. multiplé; < L. multipes (-ped-), many-footed (> multipecta, a many-footed insect), < multus, many, + pes (-ped-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having many feet; polypona.

II. n. A many-footed or polypous animal. multiplier (mul'ti-pli-er), a. Having many phases, in any sense of that word. [Recent.] multipinnate (mul'ti-pin'át), a. [L. multus, many, + pinnatus, feathered: see pinnate.] In bot., many times pinnate. See pinnate.

multiple (mul'ti-pl), a. and n. [= F. multiple = Sp. múltiplo = Pg. multiplicado = It. moltiplicando, < L. multiplus, manifold, < L. multus, many, + plus, as in duplus, double, etc., akin to E. fold: see fold, and cf. duplex, triple, etc. Cf. multiplex, with diff. second element.] I. a. 1. Manifold; having many parts or relations.—2. Consisting of more than one complete individual.

—Law of multiple proportion, in chem., the law, first announced by Dalton, that, when a given quantity of B to form definite compounds, these several quantities of B will bear a simple ratio to each other. — Multiple arc, the system of connecting electric batteries, lamps, or other circuits to the leads or main conductors where terminals of each lamp or other circuit are connected to the leads, so as to form an independent arc or circuit between them. See parallel circuit, under parallel. — Multiple contact, drilling-machine, etc. See the nouns Multiple and contact. — Multiple epidermis, in bot., an epidermis of several layers of superposed cells, resulting from the division of the original epidermal cells by partitions parallel to the surface. — Multiple fruit, See fruit, 4. — Multiple images, See image. — Multiple integral, in math., a quantity which results from the performance of integration more than once, generally with reference to different variables. — Multiple lines, in fort., several lines of detached works or ramparts arranged for the defense of a military position. — Multiple neuritis, a neuritis involving several nerves at once. — Multiple point or tangent, in math., one which results from the coincidence of two points or tangents. The multiple points of curves are made up of the three kinds of double points: namely, the point where the curve crosses itself, the outlying point, and the cusp. In like manner, the multiple tangents are made up of three kinds of double tangents: the tangent from one real convexity to another, the outlying tangent with no real point of tangency, and the tangent at an inflection. — Multiple pole, See multiple. — Multiple star, See star. — Multiple values, in alg., symbols which fulfil the algebraic conditions of a problem when several different values are given to them, as the roots of an equation, certain functions of an arc or angle, etc.

II. n. In arith., a number produced by multiplying another by a whole number: as, 12 is a multiple of 3, the latter being a submultiple or aliquot part of the former. — Common multiple of two or more numbers, a number that is divisible by each of them without remainder: thus, 24 is a common multiple of 6 and 4. The least common multiple is the smallest number of which this is true: thus, 12 is the least common multiple of 6 and 4. The same definitions apply to algebraic quantities. — Multiple of gearing, a train of gearing by which a specific power to accomplish a definite act or function is attained through change of speed ratio. Thus, in powerful shears, etc., a high speed is changed to a low speed with great increase of pressure exerted through a small distance on the cutting blade; conversely, by a multiple of gearing a high speed with less pressure may be obtained.

Multiplepointing (mul'ti-pl-poin'ting), n. In Scots law, double pointing or double distress. It gives rise to an action by which a person possessed of money or effects which are claimed by different persons obtains an adjudication for settlement and payment, corresponding to interpleader in England and the United States. See pointing.

multiplier (mul'ti-pli-er), a. and n. [= Sp. multiplicador = Pg. multiplicador = It. moltiplicatore, < L. multiplus (L.L. also multiplicus), manifold, < multus, many, + plere, fold: see pliate.] I. a. 1. Manifold; multiple; multiplicate.

In favour of which unspeakable benefits of the reality, what can we do but cheerfully pardon the multiplier incertitudes of the semblance?

Carlyle, Misc., IV, 137. (Davis.)

2. In bot., having petals lying over one another in folds. Also multiplicat. — Multiplex telegraphy, a method by which several messages (specifically, more than four) can be sent over the same wire. By Edison's method (see quadruplex) four messages can be sent, and the number has been increased by Rowland to twelve or sixteen. See duplex telegraph.

II. n. In math., a set of objects. multiplex (mul'ti-pli-er), a. and n. [multiplus, a.] To render multiple; manifold. [Colloq.] multiplicable (mul'ti-pli-a-bl), a. [F. multipliable, < L. multiplicabilis: see multiply. Cf. multipliable.] Capable of being multiplied.

There is a continually increasing demand for popular art, multipliable by the printing-press, illustrative of daily events, of general literature, and of natural science.

Ruskin, Lectures on Art (1873), p. 10.

multipliability (mul'ti-pli-a-bl-ness), n. Capableness of being multiplied.

multipliable (mul'ti-pli-a-bl), a. [= OF. multipliable, multipliable, F. multipliable = Sp. multipliable = Pg. multiplicavel = It. moltiplicabile, that may be multiplied, < L. multiplicabilis, multiplied, manifold, < multiplicare, multiply: see multiply.] Multipliable; capable of existing in many individual cases.

multiplacand (mul'ti-pli-kand), n. [= F. multiplacando = Sp. Pg. multiplicando = It. moltiplicando, < L. multiplacandus, gerundive of multiplicare, multiply; see multiply.] In arith., a number multiplied or to be multiplied by another, which is called the multiplier. See multiplication, 2.

The two numbers given or assigned in every multiplication have each of them a gender name, for the greater is called the multiplacand and the lesser is named the multiplier.

T. Hill, Arithmetick (1690), fol. 254.

multiply (mul'ti-pli-ka-tiv), a. [= Sp. Pg. multiplicado = It. moltiplicato, < L. multiplicatus, pp. of multiplicare, multiply; see multiply.] 1. Consisting of many, or more than one.—2. In bot., same as multiplex, 2.

multiplicated (mul'ti-pli-ka-ted), a. [F. multipliqué + -ed.] Multiplied; put in two or more folds.

The Persian "cap was human multiplied" Sir T. Herbert, Travels (1864), p. 319.

multiplication (mul'ti-pli-ka'shon), n. [ME. multiplicacion, < OF. multiplicacion, F. multiplication, < Sp. multiplicacion = Pg. multiplicação = It. moltiplicazione, < L. multiplicatio(-o-), multiplication, < multiplicare, pp. multiplicatus, multiply; see multiply.] 1. The act or process of multiplying or of increasing in number; the state of being multiplied; as, the multiplication of the human species by natural generation.

In hills feet towards Septentrion Good humour hath multiplication. Pulteney, Husbandry (E. E. T. S.), p. 175.

It may be doubted whether any of us have ever yet realized the enormous change which has taken place in the conditions of national progress by the multiplication and diffusion of cheap books. Nineteenth Century, XXIV, 400.

2. An arithmetical process in which one number, the multiplier, is considered as an operator upon another, the multiplicand, the result, called the product, being the total number of units in as many groups as there are units in the multiplier, each group being equal in number to the multiplicand; more generally, the operation of finding the quantity which results from substituting the multiplicand in place of unity in the multiplier. Thus, the multiplication of 4 by 5 gives 5 times 4, or the number of units in five groups of four units each; so the multiplication of 3 by 2 consists in finding 2 not of unity, but of 3. By a further generalization, multiplication in the higher mathematics is regarded as the process of bringing an operator under an operator. Thus, in quaternions, if a be the operation of turning a line in a given direction through a given angle, and if b be another similar vector, then ab, or the result of the multiplication of a by b, is the rotation which would result from turning a line first through a and then through b. In like manner, in the theory of differential equations, if D denote the operation of differentiation relatively to the variable x, and D' denote the same operation relatively to the variable y, then the operation of differentiating first relatively to y and then relatively to x is regarded as the product of D by D', and is written D'D. In the algebra of logical relations, the multiplication of one relative by another consists in putting the relation of the multiplier and distinctively in place of the correlates of the multiplier. In other cases, multiplication consists in combining (in some specific way) each unit of the multiplier with each unit of the multiplicand, and this definition may be regarded as including every other. Thus, the multiplication of 2 feet of length by 3 feet of breadth is considered as giving 6 feet of area. In each of which square feet one unit of length is combined with one unit of breadth. So the momentum of a body having a motion of translation is said to be the product of the mass into the velocity—that is, is the result of imparting to each particle of the mass the whole of the given velocity. In the Boolean algebra, the product of two classes A and B is the whole of the class embraced by both—that is, it embraces all the individuals each of which reunites the characters of A and of B. In algebra, multiplication is denoted by writing the multiplier before the multiplicand, either directly, or with a cross (x) or a dot (.) interposed between them. All multiplication follows the distributive principle, expressed by the formula

$$(a + b)(c + d) = ac + bc + ad + bd.$$

Under certain restrictions, all multiplication follows the associative principle, expressed by the formula $(abc) = (cab)$. According to the nature of the conjunction of units, multiplication does or does not follow the commutative principle, expressed by the formula $ab = ba$.

3. Specifically, in bot., increase in the number of parts of a flower, either (a) in the number of whorls or spiral turns, or (b) in the number of organs (pistils, stamens, petals, or sepals) in any whorl, circle, or spiral turn. Also called augmentation. See chorion.—4. The supposed art of increasing gold and silver by alchemical means. Chaucer.

It is ordained and established, That none from henceforth shall use to multiply Gold and Silver; nor use the craft of Multiplication; and if any the same do, and be thereof attainted, that he incur the Pain of Felony in this case. Stat. 5 Hen. IV., cap. 1.

Multiplication of Gold or Silver, the Art of increasing those Metals, which in the Time of K. Henry IV. was presumed possible to be effected by means of Eliza, or other Chymical Compositions. Quoted in Duke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 111.

Item, you commanded multiplication and alchemie to be practised, thereby to abate the king's coine. Stow, Edw. VI., an. 1549.

Anagrammatic, commutative, internal multiplication. See the adjectives. — Cross or duodecimal multiplication. See duodecimal, n. 2. — Multiplication table, a table containing the product of all the simple digits, and onward to some assumed limit, as to 12 times 12. — Polar or external multiplication, a multiplication in which the reversal of the order of the factors invariably reverses the sign of the product, while not altering its numerical value. Contrasted with internal multiplication.

multiplicative (mul'ti-pli-ka-tiv), a. and n. [= F. multiplicatif = Sp. Pg. It. moltiplicativo; as multiplicate + -ive.] I. a. Tending to multiply or increase; having the power to multiply numbers.

II. n. A numeral adjective describing an object as repeated a certain number of times or as consisting of a certain number of parts, such as single, double (duplex), triple (treble), quadruple, quantuple, or tenfold, threefold, fourfold, fivefold.

multiplicator (mul'ti-pli-ka-tor), n. [= F. multiplicateur = Sp. Pg. It. moltiplicador = It. moltiplicatore, < L. multiplicator, a multiplier, < L. multiplicare, pp. multiplicatus, multiply; see multiply.] Same as multiplier, 2.

multiplicious (mul'ti-pli-sh'us), a. [L. multiplex (multiplici), multiplex, + -ous.] Manifold; multiplex.

The animal (amphibena) is not one, but multiplicious, or many, which hath a duplicity or germination of principal parts. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III, 15.

This sense (smelling) . . . although sufficiently grand and admirable, (yet) is not so multiplicious as of the eye or ear. Berkeley, Philosophy, iv. 4.

multipliciously (mul'ti-pli-sh'us-ly), adv. In a manifold or multiplex manner.

multiplicity (mul'ti-pli-si'ti), n. [= F. multiplicité = Sp. multiplicidad = Pg. moltiplicitade = It. moltiplicità, < L. L. multiplicitas (-is), manifoldness, < L. multiplex, manifold; see multiplex.] 1. The state of being multiplex or manifold or various; the condition of being numerous.

Moreover, as the manifold variation of the parts, so the multiplicity of the use of each part, is very wonderful. N. Gree, Cosmologia Sacra, I, 5.

2. Many of the same kind; a large number.

Had they discoursed rightly but upon this one principle that God was a being infinitely perfect, they could never have asserted a multiplicity of gods. South, Sermons.

A multiplicity of laws give a judge as much power as a want of law, since he is ever sure to find among the number some to countenance his partiality. Goldsmith, Reverie at Bear a-Head Tavern.

Multiplicity of a curve, the total number of multiple points, crunodes, acnodes, and cusps, or of their compound equivalents, belonging to it. Thus, a curve having no singularity except a cuspoid cusp has a multiplicity of 2, since a ramphoid cusp is equivalent to a simple cusp and a crunode. — Order of multiplicity of a right line with reference to a surface, the number of tangent planes to the surface from the line.

multiplier (mul'ti-pli-er), n. 1. One who or that which multiplies or increases in number.

Brills and quarrels are alone the great accumulators and multipliers of injuries. Deacy of Christian Piety.

2. An alchemist. Compare multiplication, 3.

Alchemists were formerly called multipliers, although they never could multiply, as appears from a statute of Henry IV. repealed in the preceding record.

F. D. Mallet, Curios. of Lit., I, 37a.

3. The number in the arithmetical process of multiplication by which another is multiplied. Also multiplicator.—4. A flat coil of conducting wire used as the coil of a galvanoscope. The tendency to deflection is proportional nearly to the number of coils.—5. An arithmometer for performing calculations in multiplication. E. H. Knight.—6. A multiplying-reel; an attachment to an anglers' reel which gathers in the slack with multiplied speed at each revolution of the crank. See reel.—Indeterminate, last, etc. multiplier. See the adjectives.

fold: see multifold.] I. trans. 1. To make manifold; increase in number or quantity; make more by natural generation or reproduction, or by accumulation, addition, or repetition: as, to multiply man or horses; to multiply evils.

That God for his grace gave grayn multiplex.
Piers Plowman, p. 135. (Richardson.)

I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt. Ex. vii. 2.

Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain; he multiplieth words without knowledge. Job xxiv. 16.

When they are come to the bottom, another Cause presently presents it self, which terrifieth those that enter with the multiplied sounds of Cymbals and vncouth ministrals.
Purcell, Pilgrimage, p. 234.

Nothing but Groans and Sighs were heard around,
And Echo multiply'd each mournful sound.
Congress, Tears of Amaryllis.

2. In arith., to perform the operation of multiplication upon. See multiplication, 2.—3†. To increase (the precious metals) by alchemical means. See multiplication, 3.

An impostor that had like to have impos'd upon us a pretended secret of multiplying gold.
 Evelyn, Diary, Dec. 14, 1650.

Multiplying camera, gearing, glass, etc. See the nouns.

II. intrans. 1. To grow or increase in number or extent; extend; spread.

Be fruitful and multiply. Gen. i. 22.

The word of God grew and multiplied. Acts xii. 24.

As dangers and difficulties multiplied, she multiplied resources to meet them. Prescott, Ferd. and Is., ii. 16.

2. In arith., to perform the process of multiplication. See multiplication, 2.—3†. To increase gold or silver by alchemical means.

Whom that listeth outen his folye,
Let him come forth, and lerne multiplye
(Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 282.)

multiplying-lens (mul'ti-pli-ing-len-z), n. See lens.

multiplying-machine (mul'ti-pli-ing-ma-shin'), n. A form of calculating-machine.

multiplying-wheel (mul'ti-pli-ing-hwel'), n. A wheel which increases the number of movements in machinery.

multipolar (mul-ti-pō-lār), a. and n. [L. multus, many, + polus, pole: see polar.] I. a. Having many poles, as a nerve-cell or a dynamo: opposed to unipolar, bipolar. See cut under cell, 5. Multipolar dynamo, a dynamo in which more than one pair of magnetic poles are used. Multipolar telephone, a magneto-telephone in which more than one pole is opposed to the membrane.

II. n. An electromagnetic machine in which several magnetic poles are used or ex- t. Also called multiple pole.

multipotent (mul-tip'ō-tent), a. [L. multipotens (-t-), very powerful, < multus, much, + potens (-t-), powerful: see potent.] Having manifold power, or power to do many things. [Rare.]

By Jove multipotent,
Thou shouldst not bear from me a Greekish member Wherein my sword had not impressure made Of our rank feud. Shak., T. and C., iv. 6, 129.

multipresence (mul-ti-prez'ens), n. [< multipresens (-t) + re. Cf. presence.] The power or act of being present in many places at once, or in more places than one at the same time.

This steely tale of transubstantiation was surely brought into the world, and upon the stage, by that other fable of the Multipresence of Christ's body.

Dr. Hall, No Peace with Rome, i. iii. 3.

The medieval schoolmen and modern Roman divines ascribe omnipresence only to the divine nature and person of Christ, unpre- sence to his human body in heaven, and a miraculous multipresence to his body and blood in the sacrament of the altar.

Schaf, Christ and Christianity, p. 75.

multipresent (mul-ti-prez'ent), a. [< L. multus, many, + presens (-t-), present: see present, a.] Being present in more places than one; having the property or power of multipresence.

multiradiate (mul-ti-rā-di-āt), a. [< L. multus, many, + radius, ray: see radiate, a.] Having many rays; polyactinal.

multiradicate (mul-ti-rad'i-kāt), a. [< Ll. multiradix (-radio-), many-rooted (< L. multus, many, + radix (radio-), a root): see radicate.] Having many roots.

multiramified (mul-ti-ram'i-fid), a. [< L. multus, many, + ramus, a branch, + facere, make: see ramify.] Much-branched; having many branches.

The Heddings claim to be not less genuine derivatives from the antique branch of Cadwallader than any of the last-named multi-ramified families.

Penock, Heddings Hall, i.

multiramous (mul-ti-rā'mōs), a. [< L. multus, many, + ramus, branch: see ramose.] Having many branches.

multiramous (mul-ti-rā'mus), a. Same as multiramous.

multisaccate (mul-ti-sak'āt), a. [< L. multus, many, + saccus, a sac: see saccate.] Having many sacs.

multiscient (mul-tish'ent), a. [< L. multus, many, + scient (scient-), pp. of scire, know: see scient.] Knowing many things; having much learning.

multiscious (mul-tish'us), a. [< L. multiscius, knowing much, < multus, much, + scire, knowing, < scire, know.] Having variety of knowledge. Bailey.

multisect (mul-ti-sekt'), a. [< L. multus, many, + sectus, pp. of secare, cut.] Having many segments, as an insect or a worm.

multisection (mul-ti-sek'shun'), v. t. To divide into more than two parts.

multisection (mul-ti-sek'shun'), n. The act of multisectioning.

multiseptate (mul-ti-sep'tāt), a. [< L. multus, many, + septum, a partition: see septate.] In seed, and bot., having many septa, dissepiments, or partitions: as, multiseptate spores.

multiserial (mul-ti-sē-ri-āl), a. [< L. multus, many, + series, series: see serial.] Having many series: arranged in many rows; multifarious; polystichous.

multiserial (mul-ti-sē-ri-āt), a. Same as multiserial.

multisiliqueous (mul-ti-sil'i-ku-us), a. [= F. multiliqueus = Sp. multilicuous, < L. multus, many, + siliqua, siliqua: see siliquous.] Having many pods or seed-vessels.

multisonous (mul-ti-sō-nus), a. [= Pg. multisono, < L. multisonus, loud-sounding, < multus, much, + sonus, sound.] Having many sounds, or sounding much.

multispiral (mul-ti-spi-rāl), a. [< L. multus, many, + spira, spire: see spiral.] Having many turns or whorls: applied in conchology (a) to spiral univalve shells of many whorls, and (b) to opercula of many concentric rings.

multistaminate (mul-ti-stam'i-nāt), a. [< L. multus, many, + stamen, the thread of a warp (Nl. stamen): see staminate.] In bot., bearing many stamens.

multistriate (mul-ti-stri-āt), a. [< L. multus, many, + stria, a streak: see striate.] Having many striae, streaks, or stripes.

multisulcate (mul-ti-sul'kāt), a. [< L. multus, many, + sulcus, furrow: see sulcate.] Having many sulci or furrows; much furrowed.

multisyllable (mul-ti-sil-a-bl), n. [= It. multisillabo, < L. multus, many, + syllaba, syllable: see syllable.] A word of many syllables; a polysyllable.

multitentaculate (mul'ti-ten-tak'u-lāt), a. [< L. multus, many, + Nl. tentaculum, tentacle: see tentaculate.] Having many tentacles.

multititular (mul-ti-ti'l-yār), a. [< L. multus, many, + titulus, title: see titular.] Having many titles.

multituberculate (mul'ti-tū-bēr'ku-lāt), a. [< L. multus, many, + tuberculum, a small swelling, tubercle: see tuberculate.] Having many tubercles, as teeth. Micros, Science, XXIX, i. 20.

multituberculated (mul'ti-tū-bēr'ku-lāt-ed), a. Same as multituberculate. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV, 376.

multitubular (mul-ti-tū'bū-lār), a. [< L. multus, many, + tubulus, a tube: see tubular.] Having many tubes: as, a multitubular boiler.

multitude (mul'ti-tud), n. [< F. multitude = Sp. multitud = Pg. multitude, multitudo = It. moltitudine, multitudine, < L. multitudo (-din-), a great number, a multitude, a crowd, in gram. the plural number, < multus, Ol. mollius, much, many, appar. orig. a pp. of altus, high, deep, orig. pp. of alere, nourish, grow: see altitude, old.] 1. The character of being many; numerousness; also, a great number regarded collectively or as congregated together. Aquinas and others distinguish transcendental and material multitudes; but it is difficult to attach any definite conception to transcendental multitude, which is the opposite of transcendental unity. Material multitude is the multitude of individuals of the same species, an expression which supposes matter to be the principle of individuation.

Armed freemen scattered over a wide area are deterred from attending the periodic assemblies by cost of travel, by cost of time, by danger, and also by the experience that multitudes of men unprepared and unorganized are helpless in presence of an organized few.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., i. 406.

2. A great number, indefinitely.

It is a fault in a multitude of preachers that they utterly neglect method in their sermons. Watts.

3. A crowd or throng; a gathering or collection of people. According to some ancient legal authorities, it required at least ten to make a multitude. The multitude, the populace, or the mass of men without reference to an assemblage.

The hasty multitude

Admiring enter'd; and the work some praise,
And some the architect. Milton, P. L., l. 730.

That great enemy of reason, virtue, and religion, the multitude. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, li. i.

Gyn. Multitude, Throng, Crowd, swarm, mass, host, legion. A multitude, however great, may be in a space so large as to give each one ample room; a throng or a crowd is generally smaller than a multitude, but is gathered into a close body, a throng being a company that presses together or fore and aft, and a crowd carrying the closeness to uncomfortable physical contact.

A very subtle argument could not have been communi- cated to the multitudes that visited the shows.

De Quincey, Secret Societies, i.

We are now, yet living in the field,
To smother up the English in our throngs,
If any order might be thought upon. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 5, 20.

It crosses here, it crosses there,
Thru' all that crowd confused and loud.

Tennyson, Maud, xxi.

multitudinarian (mul-ti-tū'di-nā-ri), a. [*< L. as if multitudinarius, < multitudo (-din-), a multi- tude: see multitude.] Multitudinous; manifold. [Rare.]

multitudinous (mul-ti-tū'di-nus), a. [*< L. as if multitudinosis, < multitudo (-din-), a multi- tude: see multitude.] 1. Consisting of a multi- tude or great number.

Multitudinous echoes awake and died in the distance.

Longfellow, Evangeline, li. 2.

2. Of vast extent or number, or of manifold di- versity; vast in number or variety, or in both.

My hand will rather

The multitudinous seas incarnadine,

Making the green one red.

Shak., Macbeth, li. 2, 62.

One might with equal wisdom seek to whistle the vague multitudinous hum of a forest.

K. Thurney, Nineteenth Century, LXXI, 446.

3†. Of or pertaining to the multitude.

At once pluck out

The multitudinous tongue, let them not lick

The sweet which is their poison.

Shak., Cor., iii. 1, 150.

multitudinously (mul-ti-tū'di-nus-lī), adv. In a multitudinous manner; in great number or with great variety.

multitudinousness (mul-ti-tū'di-nus-ness), n. The character or state of being multitudinous.

Its [nature of] multitudinousness is commended by a sense of power.

J. Martineau, Materialism, p. 151.

multivagant (mul-tiv'a-gant), a. [< L. multus, much, + vagant (-s), pp. of vagari, wander: see vagrant.] Same as multivagant.

multivagant (mul-tiv'a-gant), a. [< L. multus, much, + vagus, wandering, strolling: see vague.] Wan- dering much. Bailey.

multivalence (mul-tiv'a-lens), n. [< multiva- lens (-t) + re.] The property of being multiva- lent.

multivalent (mul-tiv'a-lent), a. [< L. multus, many, + valens (-t-), pp. of valere, be strong. Cf. equivalent.] In chem., equivalent in combining or displacing power to a number of hydrogen or other monad atoms.

multivalve (mul-ti-valv), a. and n. [= F. multi- valve, < L. multus, many, + valva, door: see valve.] I. a. Having many valves. Formerly ap- plicably applied (a) among mollusks, to the coat of shell shells, chitons or Chitonidae, and (b) among crustaceans, to the scorn shells or chitons of the family Halimidae or Lepadidae, once supposed to be mollusks. Also multi- valvular.

II. n. A multivalve zoological shell.

Multivalvia (mul-ti-val'vī-ā), n. pl. [Nl., < L. multus, many, + valva, door: see multivalve.] In Linnaeus's system of classification, a divi- sion of his Tesacea, including his genera Chiton and Lepus.

multivalvular (mul-ti-val'vū-lār), a. Same as multivalve.

multiversant (mul-ti-ver'sant), a. [< L. multus, many, + versant (-s), pp. of vertere, turn about, intens. of verte, turn: see verse. Cf. conversant.] Turning into many shapes; as- suming many forms; protean.

multivorous (mul-tiv'ō-rus), a. [< L. multivorus, having many ways, < multus, many, + via, way.] Having many ways or roads. [Rare.]

multivocal (mul-tiv'ō-kāl), a. and n. [< L. multus, much, many, + vox (voc-), voice: see vocal.] I. a. Ambiguous; equivocal.

An ambiguous or multivocal word. Coleridge.

Multiloculi, as conducting to brevity and expressiveness, are unwisely condemned, or deprecated.
F. Hall, M.D., Eng., p. 170.

Some (races of silkworms) are multivoltine.

Flies . . . are multocular, having as many eyes as there are perforations in their cornea.
Berkham, Physico Theology, viii. 3, note k.

Butter ~~more~~ than meddle overmuch.
(Don Quixote, Steele (Hasted, Arber), Ed., p. 85.)

mumbler (mum'blér), n. One who mumbles.
Mass mumbler, holy-water swiggers.

George and the Dragon, with sundry whimsical adjuncts.

This festival [of fools] was a religious mummery, usually held at Christmas time.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 308.

2. A ceremony or performance considered false or pretentious; farcical show; hypocritical disguise and parade; applied in contempt to various religious ceremonies by people who are of other sects or beliefs.

The temple and its holy rites profan'd

By mumm'ries he that dwell in it disdain'd.

Corper, Exposition, l. 145.

But for what we know of Elousis and its mummery, which is quite enough for all practical purposes, we are indebted to none of you ancients, but entirely to modern sagacity.

De Quincey, Secret Societies, l.

mummet (mum'et), n. [Perhaps a dial. corruption of mommery (ME. mommery): see quot.] Luncheon. [Local, Eng.]

This mummery -- which seems to have been a meal in lieu of a nap -- is still the word by which luncheon was called at Bristol in my childhood, but corrupted into mummet.

Southey.

mummia (mum'i-ā), n. [ML.: see mummy.] Same as mummy. 2.

He supposed that Mummia was made of such as the sands had surprised and buried quick; but the true Mummia is made of embalmed bodies of men, as they use to do in Egypt.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 230.

Your followers

Were such as my uncle would take. T. Hood.

mummy (mum'i), n.; pl. mummies (-iz). [Formerly also mummie, mumme; in late ME. momy, momyan (def. 2); = D. G. Sw. Dan. mumie, < OF. mumie, F. momie = Sp. Pg. momia = It. mumia, < ML. mumia, momia, mumia = NGr. potua = Turk. mumiya = Pers. mūmīdī (> Hind. mūmīdī), a mummy (Hind. also a medicine), < Ar. mūmīdī, pl. mūmīdī, an embalmed body, a mummy, < mūm (> Pers. mūm, > Hind. mūm), wax (used in embalming); cf. Coptic mum, bitumen, gum-resin. 1. A dead human body embalmed and dried after the manner of the ancient Egyptian preparation for burial. An immense number of mummies are found in Egypt, consisting not only of human bodies, but of those of various animals, as bulls, apes, fishes, crocodiles, fish, etc. The processes of embalming bodies were very various. The bodies of the poorer classes were merely dried with salt or natron, and wrapped up in coarse cloths. Those of the rich and the great underwent the most complicated operations, and were laboriously adorned with various ornaments. The embalmers extracted the brain through the nostrils, and the entrails through an incision in the side. The body was then shaved and washed, the belly filled with perfumes, and the whole body covered with natron, and steeped in the same material for seventy days. After this the corpse was washed, treated with balsam or other antiseptics, and then wrapped up in linen bandages, sometimes to the number of twenty thicknesses. The body was then put into an ornamented case of wood or cartonnage. Sometimes the cases were double. The term mummy is likewise used of human bodies preserved in other ways, either by artificial preparation or by accident. The Chinese, or ancient people of the Canaries, embalmed their dead in a simple but effectual manner. In some situations the conditions of the soil and atmosphere, by the rapidity with which they permit the drying of the animal tissues, are alone sufficient for the preservation of the body with the general characteristics of a mummy. This is the case in some parts of South America, especially at Arica (formerly in Peru) where considerable numbers of bodies have been found quite dry, in pits dug in a dry saline soil. In some places natural mummies are occasionally found in caverns or in crypts, as in a well-known church-crypt in Bordeaux, France. Natural mummies of various animals are often found in such state of preservation as to allow of scientific description of many of their parts.

Head of Mummy of Seti I, father of Ramses II

An imposture perhaps contrived by the Water-men, who, fetching them [the arms and legs] from the Mummies, . . . do stick them over-night in the sand.

Savigny, Traveller, p. 100.

2. The substance of a mummy; a medicinal preparation supposed to consist of the substance of mummies or of dead bodies; hence, a medicinal liquor or gum in general. Also mumma. See first quotation under mummia.

Mummy hath great force in standing blood, which may be ascribed to the mixture of balsam that are glutinous.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., 4. 100.

'Tis true; there's magic in the web of it.
And it was dyed in mummy which the skillful Conserved of maidens' hearts.

Shak., Othello, III. 4. 74.

Make mummy of my flesh, and sell me to the apothecaries.

Shirley, Bird in a Cage, l. 1.

In or near this place is a precious liquor or mummy growing . . . a moist, redolent gum like, sovereign against poisons.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 124.

Mummy is said to have been first brought into use in medicine by the malice of a Jewish physician, who wrote that flesh thus embalmed was good for the cure of divers diseases, and particularly bruises, to prevent the blood's gathering and coagulating.

Chambers's Cyc., 1736.

3. In hort., a kind of wax used in grafting and planting trees. 4. A brown color prepared from the asphalt taken from Egyptian mummies, and used as an oil-color by artists. It resembles asphaltum in its general qualities, and has the advantage of being less liable to crack. It was supposed that the asphalt taken from the Egyptian mummies made the finest color. Proc. Inst., III. 361. To beat to a mummy, to beat soundly, or till insensible.

mummy (mum'i), r. l.; pret. and pp. mummied, ppr. mummifying. [Cf. mummy, n.] To embalm; mummify. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 21.

mummy (mum'i), n.; pl. mummies (-iz). [Short for mummychog.] A mummychog. Massachusetts Fisheries Report for 1872, p. 51.

mummy-case (mum'i-kās), n. In Egyptian archaeol., a case of wood or cartonnage in which a mummy was inclosed, having as nearly as possible the shape of the mummy, and carved and painted so as to represent the dead person. The mummy cases of the rich were often very elaborately painted and inlaid, and were inclosed in a second or outer case of wood, or a sarcophagus of stone, the latter being sometimes also of the form of the mummy, but more frequently rectangular. See note in next column.

mummychog (mum'i-chog), n. [Amer. Ind. mummachog.] A salt-water minnow, the com-mummachog, mummichog, mumschog, mummychog.

mummy-cloth (mum'i-klōth), n. 1. Cloth in which mummies are enveloped, a fabric as to the material of which there is some dispute, but which is generally admitted to be linen. 2. A modern textile fabric made to some extent in imitation of the ancient fabric, and used especially as a foundation for embroidery. 3. A fabric resembling crepe, having the warp of either cotton or silk and the weft of woolen; used for mourning when black on account of its lusterless surface. Also mummy cloth.

mummy-wheat (mum'i-hwēt), n. A variety of wheat, originally considered a distinct species, Triticum compactum, cultivated in Egypt and Abyssinia, and to some extent elsewhere. It has been raised from grains found in mummy cases probably placed there, however, by fraud.

mump (mump), v. [Cf. D. mumpen, mump, cheat; a strengthened form of mommen, mumble; see mum, v.] The Gt. bi-mumpian, deride, i. e. perhaps ult. related. In part perhaps associated with munch, as crump with crunch, hump with hunch, lump with lunch, etc. Hence mumps. 1. Intrans. 1. To mumble or mutter, as in sulkiness.

And when he's croak or sullen any way,

He mumps, and lowers, and hangs the lip, they say.

John Taylor, Works (1630), (Nares.)

When they come with their counterfeit looks, and mumping tones, think them players. Lamb, Essay of Ruggers.

2. To mumble; chew; munch, or move the jaw as if munching.

Ag'd mumpian bedlamers. Nash, Terrors of the Night.

Spend but a quarter so much time in mumping upon Gabrielism.

Nash, Dedication to Haue with you to Saffron-Walden.

3. To chatter; make mouth; grin like an ape.

Ter. The tailor will run mad upon my life for 't.

Ped. How be mump and inlids; he will ne'er cut clothes again.

Fletcher and Bowyer, Maid in the Mill, III. 1.

4. To emulose aims in a low muttering tone; play the beggar; hence, to deceive; practise imposture.

The Sunne was so in his mumps upon it, that it was almost none before hee could get to cart that day. Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Hart. Misc., VI. 168). (Darwin)

2. A contagious non-suppurative inflammation of the parotid and sometimes of the other salivary glands and of the circumglandular connective tissue; idiopathic parotitis. Mumps is usually an innocent affection without dangers or sequelae. It begins with pain and then swelling behind the jaw, close to the ear, on one side. The pain at first is caused by motion of the jaw or the presence of acids. The other side is involved a day or two later. There may be inflammation of the testes and scrotum in males, or of the mammae, ovaries, and vulva in females, this extension is, however, mostly confined to pubescence and adult life. One attack usually protects. The period of incubation is thought to be from 7 to 14 days.

3. A drinking game.

Now, he is nobody that cannot drinke super nagulum, carmine the hunter's hoop, quaffe usque freze crosse, with leaper gloves, mumps, frolicke, and a thousand such dominating inventions. Nashe, Pierce Penitence.

mumpsimus (mump'si-mus), n. [A term originating in the story of an ignorant priest who in saying his mass had long said mumpsimus for sumpsimus, and who, when his error was pointed out, replied, "I am not going to change my old mumpsimus for your new sumpsimus." The story evidently refers to the post-communion prayer "Quod ore sumpsimus," etc.] An error obstinately clung to; a prejudice.

Some be to stiffe in their old mumpsimus, others be to busy and curious in their new sumpsimus. Hall, Hen. VIII. (Halliwell.)

More chance of circumlocution in their infallible determinator of the true and the false, and, somehow, it cannot be that their old mumpsimus is preferable to any new sumpsimus. F. Hall, Mod. Eng. p. 137.

C.; appar. the name, like the thing, was of Asiatic origin.*] In Rom. antiq., an ornamental stone of which vases, cups, and other ornamental articles were made. This material and the various things made from it are mentioned by several Greek and Latin authors, but Pliny is the only one who has attempted any detailed description of it. Unfortunately his accounts are so vague that the material cannot be positively identified, nor has anything been found in the excavations at Rome which is certainly known to be the ancient murra. In the opinion of the best authorities, however, it was fluor-spar, for of the known materials this is the only one found in abundance which has the peculiar coloration indicated by Pliny. The principal objection to this theory is that no fragments of fluor-spar vases have been found in Rome or its vicinity. Vases of murra were at one time considered by the Romans as of inestimable value.

murra (mur'an), n. and a. [Formerly also murren; < ME. murrin, murren; < ME. moryne, moryn, < OF. morine = Sp. morriña = Pg. morrinha = It. moria, sickness among cattle, < L. mori, die; see mor¹.] 1. n. A disease affecting domestic animals, especially cattle; a catle-plague or epizootic disease of any kind; in a more limited sense, the same as foot-and-mouth disease (which see, under foot).

No wot no wight, as lech wene what is yifow to mene.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 228.

This plague of murren continued twenty-eight years ere it ended, and was the first rot that ever was in England.
Stow, Edw. I., an. 1257.

Murra take you, a murra to or on you, etc., plague take you; plague upon you.

A murra on your monster! Shak., Tempest, iii. 2. 88.

II. a. Affected with murrain.

The fold stands empty in the drowned field,
And crows are fattened with the murrion flock.
Shak., M. S. D., ii. 1. 07.

murrainly (mur'an-li), adv. [Also murrenly; < murrain + -ly.] Excessively; plausibly. Darwin.

And ye'd bene there, cham sure you'd murrenly ha wondred.
By. Still, Gammer Gurton's Needle, iii. 2.

murray (mur'a), n. Same as moray.

Murraya (mur'a-g), n. [ML. (Linnaeus, 1771), named after J. A. Murray, a Swedish botanist.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees of the poly-petalous order Rutaceae and the tribe Turantieae, known by its pinnate leaves, linear awl-shaped filaments, and imbricate petals. Four species are known, of tropical Asia and the islands as far as Australia, very small summer-flowering trees with dotted leaves, small oblong berries, and fragrant white flowers resembling orange-blossoms. M. exoni has been called Minas box, and its large variety (sometimes regarded as a species, M. Sumatran) Sumatra orange. The species is valuable for its perfume, and yields a bitter extract, murrayin. The seeds of M. Kani afford a fixed oil called simbolae-oil. See curry-leaf.

Murray cod. See cod².

murrayin, murrayine (mur'a-in), n. [< Murray + -in.] See Murraya.

murte¹, n. See mur².

murte² (mør), n. [Also marre; origin obscure.] 1. The common guillemot, Uria or Lomvia troile, and other species of the genus, as U. or L. brin-

Murte, or Forked Guillemot (Lomvia troile).

nicht, the thick-billed murte or guillemot. — murte, the slender but quite distinct razor-billed auk, Alca or Lomvia torda. See cut under razor-bill.

murra (mūr'ā), n. [C. murra + lat.] A small bird of the oak family, Alcedo, related to the murres. Several species of murra inhabit the North Pacific; they belong to the genera Brachyramphus and Spizella. The murra is a small bird, with a black head and back, and a white breast. The murra is a small bird, with a black head and back, and a white breast. The murra is a small bird, with a black head and back, and a white breast.

murra, n. An obsolete form of murra.

murra (mūr'ā), a. and n. [C. OF. more = Sp. morado = It. morato, mulberry-colored, < ML. moratus, black, blackish (cf. moratum, a kind of drink, wine colored with mulberries: see more), < L. morus, a mulberry: see more.] I. a. Of a mulberry (dark-red) color.

The leaves of some trees turn a little murra or reddish. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 512.

After him followed two pert apple-squires: the one had a murra cloth gown on. Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier (Harl. Misc., V. 420).

II. n. In herb, a tincture of a dark-reddish brown, also called sanguine, indicated in heraldic representations in black and white by lines crossing each other diagonally at right angles.

murra, n. See murra.

murra, n. See murra.

murra, n. A variant of Morian.

murra (mūr'ā), n. pl. [L. also less prop. murra, myrrina, neut. pl. of myrrina, of murra: see myrrine.] Murrine vessels, chiefly shallow vessels and cups. See murra.

Murra continued to be in request down to the close of the empire, and legal writers are continually mentioning them as distinct things from vessels of glass or of the precious metals. King, Nat. Hist. of Gems, p. 188.

murra, n. An error for murra.

murra (mūr'ā), n. [Also myrrine, myrrine, < L. myrrinus, less prop. myrrinus, myrrinus, of murra: see murra.] Made of or pertaining to murra. See murra.

How they quaff in gold,
Crystal, and myrrine cups, emboss'd with gems
And studs of pearl. Milton, P. R., iv. 119

Murra glass, a modern decorative glass-manufacture, in which gold and other metals are used for decoration in the body of the glass and are seen through the glass itself: precious stones are sometimes embedded in the paste.

murra, n. An obsolete form of murra.

murra (mūr'ā), n. Same as murra.

murra (mūr'ā), n. [Ar. (> Turk.) murshid, a spiritual guide; cf. rashid, orthodox, rashid, prudent, rashid, prudence, orthodoxy.] The head of a Mohammedan religious order. Encyc. Brit., VII. 113.

murra, n. A Middle English form of mirth.

murra, n. [ME., < AN. morth, murder: see murder.] Murder; slaughter.

The scourge was so stiffe the strong men and That full mekell was the murra, & nony was ded.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1083.

murra, n. See murra, etc.

murra (mūr'ā), n. [Ar. murra, murra, n. A palm, Artocaryum Murra.

murra (mūr'ā), n. [Ar. murra, murra, n. The astringent bark of Dyoscorea spicata, of the West Indies and South America, used in Brazil for tanning.

murra, a. An obsolete form of murra.

Mus (mus), n. [NL., < L. mus = Gr. μῦς = E. mouse.] The leading genus of Muridae, typical of the subfamily Murina. The term was formerly used with great latitude for the whole family and various other rodents. It is now restricted to species like the common house-mouse, Mus musculus; the common rat, M. decumanus; the black rat, M. rattus; M. sylvaticus, the wood-mouse of Europe; and M. minutus, the harvest-mouse of the same continent. It still includes a great many species of mice and rats, all indigenous to the Old World. Also Musca. See cut under harvest-mouse.

Musa (mū'zā), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), prob. < Ar. wāze, banana.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, type of the order Scitamineae and the tribe Musae, known by its tubular calyx. There are about 30 species, natives of the tropics. They are herbs with thick smooth tree-like stems formed of sheathing petioles, rising 4 to 30 feet high from solid watery bulbs, with large oblong leaves from 3 to 20 feet long, and yellowish flowers in the axils of large ornamental bracts (often purplish) the whole forming a long nodding spike. M. sapientum is the banana. M. paradisiaca (perhaps not distinct fr. in the former) is the plantain. M. textilis is the Manila hemp. The finest ornamental species is M. Eschscholii, the Abyssinian banana. See cut under banana and plantain.

Musaceae (mū'zā-sē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Massey, 1816), < Musa + -aceae.] A natural order of monocotyledonous plants, typified by the genus Musa; the banana or plantain family. It embraces 4 other genera.

musaceous (mū'zā-si-us), a. [C. Musaceae + -ous.] In bot., of or relating to the Musaceae.

musographist, musography, etc. See musography, etc.

musard, a. and n. An obsolete form of musard.

musard (mū'zārd), a. [C. Musard; as Musard + -ed.] Relating to the Musard or poetry; poetical. [Rare.]

musard, n. See musard.

Muselman (mus'al-man), n. and a. Same as Musliman.

musang (mū-sang'), n. [Malay mūsang.] A viverrid mammal of the genus Paradoxurus, P. hermaphroditus (also called P. musanga, P.

Musang (Musanga ferox).

typus, and P. faeriat, occurring throughout the countries east of the Bay of Bengal—Burma, Siam, the Malay peninsula, Sumatra, Java, and Borneo. It has the back generally striped, a pale band crosses the forehead, and the whiskers are black. The name extends to any paradoxurus, and to some similar animals. The golden musang is P. aureus; the hill musang is P. grayi; the three-striped white-eared musang is Arctogale leucotis. See paradoxurus.

musard (mū'zār), n. [C. musette.] An itinerant musician who played on the musette; a bagpiper. Webster.

Musarabic (mū-zar'ā-bik), a. A variant of Muzarabic.

musard (mū'zārd), n. [C. ME. musard, < OF. (und F.) musard (= It. musardo), < musard, musard; see musard.] 1. A musar or dreamer; a vagabond.

All men wold holde thee for musard,
That debonaire have founde thee.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4034.

We no do but as musardes, and ne a-wayte nought elles but what we shall be take as a bridle in a netto, for the sainces he but a lounse hens, that all the centre robbed and destroye. Martin (E. E. T. S.), l. 183.

2. A foolish fellow. Halliwell, [Prov. Eng.]

Mus. B. An abbreviation of Bachelor of Music.

Musca (mus'kā), n. [L., = Gr. μῦς, a fly; see musard. Hence ult. mosquito.] 1. A genus of flies, or two-winged insects, founded by Linnaeus in 1763. Formerly applied to Diptera at large, and to sundry other insects, as many of the Hymenoptera, now the type of the family Muscidae, and restricted to such species as the common house-fly, M. domestica. As at present restricted, Musca is characterized by having the antennae bristly, thickly feathered on both sides, the fourth longitudinal vein of the wings bent at an angle toward the third, and middle lobe without any strong bristles or spurs on the inner side. In this sense it is not a very large genus, having but 14 species in Europe and 5 in North America, two of the latter, M. domestica and M. cornuta, being common to both continents. See cut under house-fly.

2. [L. c.] A fly or some similar insect. [In this sense there is a plural, muscae (-æ).] — 3. The Fly, a name given to the constellation also called Apis, the Bee. It is situated south of the Southern Cross, and east of the Chameleon, and contains one star of the third and three of the fourth magnitude. The name was also formerly given to a constellation situated north of Arcturus. — Musca triplices, an old name of the loboceros flies: so called because they continually wave their antennae. — Musca volitantes, specks appearing to dance in the air before the eyes, supposed to be due to opaque points in the vitreous humor of the eye.

Muscadel (mus'ka-del), n. [Also muscatel; early mod. E. muscadell; < OF. muscadell, also muscadell, F. muscadell = Sp. muscadell = It. muscadello, muscadello, < ML. muscadellum, also, after Rom., muscadellum, a wine so called, dim. of muscatum, the odor of musk (> It. muscato, musk, etc., > F. muscat, a grape, wine, pear so called): see muscat.] 1. A sweet wine: same as muscat, 2.

He calls for wine, . . . quaff'd off the muscadell,
And throw the wags all in the sexton's face.
Shak., T. of the A., III. 2. 174.

2. The grapes collectively which produce this wine. See Malaga grape, under Malaga.

In Candia they growe grett Vines, and especially of mal-wey and muscadell.
Torkington, Marie of Eng. Travell, p. 20

3. A kind of pear.

muscadin (F. pron. mūs-ka-dān'), n. [F.: see muscadine.] A dandy; a fop.

Your muscadine of Paris and your dandies of London.
Dorset, Coningsby, iv. 11

muscadine (mus'ka-din), n. and a. [Formerly also muscadine, < F. muscadine, a musk-lozenge, also dandy, beau, (It. muscadino, a grape, pear, apricot so called (Florio), < muscato, musk: see muscat.] I. n. Same as muscadell.

He . . . is at this instant breakfasting on new laid eggs and muscadine.
Abot, Kenilworth, l.

II. a. Of the color of muscadell.

Most decoctions of astringent plants, of what color soever, do leave in the liquor a deep and muscadine red.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 12

musca, n. Plural of musca, 2.

Muscales (mus-kā'lex), n. pl. [NL., pl. of musca, of musca, < L. musca, a fly: see musca.] In bot., an alliance of aerogens, divided into Hepaticae and Musci: same as Muscineae.

muscallonge, n. Same as muscallonge.

muscardine (mus'kar-din), n. [C. F. muscardine, a fungus so called (cf. muscardin, a dormouse: see muscardine), < It. muscardino, a musk confit, grape, pear, etc., var. of muscardino, F. muscardin, a musk-lozenge: see muscardine.] 1. A fungus, Botrytis Hanniana, the cause of a very destructive disease in silkworms. — 2. The disease produced in silkworms by the muscardine.

muscardine (mus'kar-din), n. [C. F. muscardin, a dormouse, prob. for muscardin, a musk-lozenge, with ref. to the animal's odor.] The dormouse, Muscardinus aellianarius.

Muscardinus (mus-kar-din-us), n. [NL., < F. muscardin, a dormouse: see muscardine.] A genus of dormouse of the family Myodidae, with a cylindrical bushy tail and thickened glandular cardiac portion of the stomach. The common dormouse of Europe, M. aellianarius, is the type. See cut under dormouse.

Muscari (mus-kā'ri), n. [NL. (Philip Miller, 1724), said to be so called "from their musky smell," < It. musca, musk: see musca.] But the term, -ari is appar. an immediate or ult. error for -arium. The word intended is appar. Muscarium, so called in ref. to their globular heads, < L. muscarium, a fly-brush, also an umbel, < musca, a fly.] A genus of ornamental plants of the order Liliaceae and the tribe Scillaceae, characterized by its globose or urn-shaped flowers. About 40 species are known, natives of Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia. They bear a few narrow fleshy leaves from a central bulb, and leafless scapes with a raceme of nodding flowers, usually blue. They are closely akin to the true hyacinth. The species in general are called orange or glaze hyacinth, especially M. botryoides, a common little garden flower of early spring, with a dense raceme of dark blue flowers, like a minute grape-cluster. It is now naturalized in the United States. M. muscaria, from its odor, is called musky hyacinth.

Muscaria (mus-kā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < L. musca, a fly: see Musca.] A tribe of brachycerous dipterous insects, containing those flies whose proboscis is usually terminated by a fleshy lobe, as in the house-fly: now equivalent to Muscida in the widest sense.

muscarian (mus-kā'ri-an), n. [C. NL. Muscaria, q. v. + -an.] Any ordinary fly, as a member of the Muscaria.

muscariform (mus-kā'ri-form), a. [C. L. muscarium, a fly-brush (< musca, a fly), + forma, form.] Having the shape of a brush; brush-shaped; in bot., furnished with long hairs toward one end of a slender body, as the style and stigma of many composites.

muscarine (mus'ka-rin), n. [C. NL. muscarium (see def.) + -ine.] An extremely poisonous alkaloid (C₁₁H₁₃NO₂) obtained from the fly-fungus, Agaricus muscarius. It produces myosis, infrequent pulse with prolonged diastole, salivation, vomiting, spasms of the muscles of the intestines, tumultuous peristalsis, great muscular weakness, dyspnoea, and death.

muscat (mus'kat), n. [C. F. muscat, a grape, wine, pear so called, < It. muscato, musk, wine, < ML. muscatum, the odor of musk, neut. of muscatum, musky, < It. musca, musk: see musca.] Hence muscatel, muscadell, muscadine.] 1. A grape having a strong odor or flavor as of musk. There are several varieties of grapes, mostly white, which come within this category.

2. Wine made from muscat-grapes, or of similar character to that so made, usually strong and more or less sweet. Also called muscadell.

He hath also sent each of us some anchovies, olives, and muscat, but I know not yet what that is, and am ashamed to ask.
Pepper, Mary, l. 224

muscatel (mus'ka-tel), n. Same as muscadell.

Muscatorium (mus-kā'th-ri-um), n. [ML., a fly-brush, < L. musca, a fly.] Ecclae, same as flabellum, 1.

muschelkalk (mush'-el-kalk), n. [G., < muschel, shell, + kalk, lime or chalk.] One of the divisions of the Triassic system as developed in Germany, occupying a position between the Keuper and Bunter. See Triassic. In both Germany and France it is subdivided into three zones, the upper one of which is a true shelly limestone, as the name indicates, while the other two are also chiefly limestone, but much less fossiliferous than the first. The formation is important on account of the beds of salt and anhydrite which it contains.

muschetor, muschetour (mus'-eh-tor, -tör), n. [< OF. muschetur, F. muschetur, little spots, < OF. muscheter, F. muscheter, spot, < OF. mousse, F. mouche, a fly, a spot, < L. musca, a fly; see mouch.] In her., a black spot resembling an ermine spot, but differing from it in the absence of the three specks. See ermine, 5.

Muscivora.

Musci (mus'-si), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. muscus, moss; see moss.] A large class of cryptogamous plants of the group Muscineae or Bryophyta; the mosses. They are low tufted plants, a few inches in height, always with a stem and distinct leaves, producing sporocarpia (spores) which usually open by a terminal lid and contain simple spores alone. The germinating spore gives rise in the typical families to a filamentous coniform prothallium, upon which is produced the leafy plant, those together constituting the sexual generation or oophyte. The sexual organs are antheridia and archegonia, and from the fertilized oöspore proceeds the sporogonium or "moss fruit," which in itself comprises the non-sexual generation or sporophyte. The sporogonium or capsule, which is rarely indehiscent or splitting by four longitudinal slits, usually opens by a lid or operculum; beneath the operculum, and arising from the mouth of the capsule, are commonly one or two rows of right processes, collectively the peristome, which are always some multiple of four; those of the outer row are called teeth; those of the inner, cilia. Between the rim of the capsule and the operculum is an elastic ring of cells, the annulus. The Musci are classified under four orders: the Bryaceae or true mosses (which are further divided into acrocarpous, or terminal-fruited, and pleurocarpous, or lateral-fruited), Phanogoneae, Andropogoneae, and Sphagnumaceae. See cut under moss.

Muscicapa (mu-sik'-a-pä), n. [NL., < L. musca, fly, + capere, take.] A Linnéan genus of flycatchers. It was formerly of great extent and indiscriminate application to numerous small birds which capture insects on the wing, but is now restricted to the most typical Muscicapidae, such as the blackcap, M. atricapilla, the spotted flycatcher, M. grisea, the white-collared flycatcher, M. collaris, etc. See cut under flycatcher.

Muscicapidae (mus-i-kap'-i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Muscicapa + -idae.] A family of Old World oscine passerine birds, typified by the restricted genus Muscicapa; the flycatchers. They are elchomorphous turdiform or thrush-like Passeres, normally with 10 primaries, 12 rectrices, notched tail, and a gapeless bill of a flattened form, broad at the base, with a ridged culmen and long rectal vibrissae. Their characteristic habit is to capture insects on the wing. Some are American, though many American flycatching birds of the selenophagous division of Sylviidae and of the clunatorial family Tyrannidae have been included in Muscicapidae. Upward of 60 genera and nearly 400 species are placed in this family in its most restricted sense.

Muscicapinae (mu-sik'-a-pi-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Muscicapa + -inae.] The flycatchers as a subfamily of Muscicapidae or of some other family.

muscapine (mu-sik'-a-pin), a. Pertaining or in any way relating to the genus Muscicapa.

muscole (mus'-i-köl), a. [< L. muscus, moss, + colere, inhabit.] In bot., living upon decayed mosses or Hepaticae, as certain lichens.

muscoline (mu-sik'-ö-lin), a. [< muscole + -ine.] Same as muscole.

muscolous (mu-sik'-ö-lus), a. [< muscole + -ous.] Same as muscole.

Muscidae (mus'-i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Musca + -idae.] The representative and by far the largest family of the order Diptera; the flies. The limits and definition of the family vary widely. It is now commonly restricted to forms with short three-jointed antennae, the third joint of which is setose; the proboscis normally ending in a fleshy lob and the palpi generally projecting; five abdominal segments; two tarsal pulvilli; and no false vein in the wing. The Muscidae comprise more than a third of the order Diptera, and are divided into numerous subfamilies, which are regarded as families by some writers. They are primarily divided into Culicidae and Acalyptratae, according as the tegulae are large or very small.

musci-form (mus'-i-för-m), a. [< NL. musci-formis, < L. musci, a fly, + forma, form.] Fly-like; resembling a common fly; of or pertaining to the Musci-formes.

musci-form (mus'-i-för-m), a. [< L. muscus, moss, + forma, form, shape.] In bot., same as muscol.

Musci-formes (mus-i-för'-mex), n. pl. [NL., pl. of musci-formis; see musci-form.] A section of musci-form Apulidae, containing those crassiflex which resemble common flies, having a comparatively stout body and short legs.

Muscinae (mu-si'-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Musca + -inae.] A subfamily of Muscidae, exemplified by the genus Musca, in which the antennal bristle is feathered to the tip, and the first posterior cell of the wing is much narrowed or closed.

Muscineae (mu-sin'-ë-sä), n. pl. [NL., < L. muscus, moss, + -inae + -ae.] A group of higher cryptogams, cörrinates in rank with the Thallophyta, Pheridophyta, and Phanerogamia, and embracing the two classes Musci and Hepaticae; same as Bryophyta.

Muscivora (mu-siv'-ä-gä), n. [NL., < L. musca, a fly, + vorare, devour.] A genus of flycatchers; same as Dumetia.

Muscivora (mu-siv'-ä-gä), n. [NL., < Musci (capa) + vora (vora).] A genus of clunatorial flycatchers of the family Tyrannidae, founded by Lafresnaye in 1837; so called from some resemblance to chits. The species are numerous, all South American. M. ruficervix and M. farinucha are examples.

muscite (mus'-it), n. [< L. muscus, moss, + -ite.] A fossil plant of the moss family, found in amber and certain fresh-water Tertiary strata. Page.

Muscivora (mu-siv'-ä-gä), n. [NL., < L. musca, a fly, + vorare, devour.] A genus of South American crested flycatchers of the family Tyrannidae. It was established by Cuvier in 1790, and was afterward called by him Muscivora, the monche-rolles. There are several species, as M. cristata and M. coronata. The term has also been variously applied to other birds of the same family, as by G. R. Gray in 1840 to species of Micropus, and by Lesson to certain flycatching birds of a different family.

muscle (mus'-l), n. [Early mod. E. also muskle; < F. muscle = Fr. muscle, muscle = Sp. músculo = Pg. musculo = It. muscolo = D. G. Sw. Dan. muskel, a muscle, < L. musculus, a muscle, a little mouse, dim. of mus, a mouse, = Gr. mus, a mouse, also a muscle, = G. mous, a mouse, a muscle; cf. F. souris, a mouse, formerly the brawn of the arm, Corn. logodon fer, cuff of the leg, lit. mouse of leg; the more prominent muscles, as the biceps, having, when in motion, some resemblance to a mouse; see mousse. Hence muscle, muscle, muscle. The pron. mus'-l instead of mus'-kl is prob. due to the ult. identical muscle, muscle, where, however, the pron. of e in -cle as 'soft' is irregular, though occurring also in corpuscule.] 1. A kind of animal tissue consisting of bundles of fibers whose essential physiological characteristic is contractility, or the capability of contracting a, anterior; b, posterior; belly of myoepistomialis, extending over the scalp; c, sternocleidomastoid; d, trapezius (a small part of it); e, atrophius aureus; f, atrophius aureus; g, tracheus aureus; h, orbicularis palpebrarum; i, orbicularis supercilii; j, orbicularis oculi; k, four small muscles of the nostril (the line marks the anterior dilatator naris, behind which is the posterior dilatator); l, compressor narium (next to the tip of the nose); m, the depressor alae nasi (directly below the posterior dilatator); n, levator labii superioris alaeque nasi; o, levator labii superioris, beneath which lies, unmarked, the levator anguli oris; p, angustator minor; q, angustator major; r, superciliaris; s, deep part of the masseter; t, marialis, beneath which lies the biceps; u, masseter, little oblique; v, depressor anguli oris; w, levator menti; x, levator labii inferioris; y, anterior and posterior belly of digastricus; z, mylohyoid; a, stylohyoid; b, hyoglossus; c, thyrohyoid; d, sternohyoid; e, anterior and posterior belly of omohyoid; f, a small part of inferior constrictor of the pharynx, just above which a small part of the middle constrictor is exposed; g, a sternus medius; h, sternus inferior; i, a sternus posterior; j, levator anguli scapulae; k, pectoralis capitis. The platysma, which covers much of the neck and the lower part of the face, has been removed.

in length and dilating in breadth on the application of a proper stimulus, as the impulse of a motor nerve, or a shock of electricity; flesh; "lean meat." By such change of form, the muscles become the immediate means of motion of the different parts of the body; and of locomotion of the body as a whole.

2. A certain portion of muscle or muscular tissue, having definite position and relation with surrounding parts, and usually fixed at one or both ends. Any one of the separate masses or bundles of muscular fibers constitutes a muscle, which as a whole and in its subdivisions is enveloped in fascial connective tissue and usually attached to the part to be moved by means of a tendon or sinew. Muscles are for the most part attached to bones, with the perosteum of which their tendons are directly continuous. The most extensive or most fixed attachment of a muscle is usually called its origin; the opposite end is its insertion. Individual muscles not only change their shape during contraction, but are of endlessly varied shapes when at rest, indicated by descriptive terms, as circular, funiform, penniform, digitiform, etc., besides which each muscle has its specific name. Such names are given from the attachments of the muscle, as sternocleidomastoid, omohyoid; or from function, as flexor, extensor; or from position, as pectoralis, glutealis; or from shape, as deltoid, trapezoid; or from some other quality or attribute, in an arbitrary manner. (Fascial muscles are those whose fibers return upon themselves; they constitute sphincters, as of the mouth, eyelids, and anus. The swelling part of a muscle is called its belly; when there are two such, separated by an intervening tendon, the muscle is double bellied or digastric. Muscles whose fibers are set obliquely upon an axial tendon are penniform or bipenniform. Muscles whose fibers are all parallel are called simple or rectilinear; those whose fibers intersect or cross each other are called compound. Muscles which act in opposition to one another are termed antagonistic; those which concur in the same action are termed muscle. Muscles subject to the will are voluntary; those which are striped, and they compose the great bulk of the muscular system. Involuntary muscles are not subject to the will; they are generally unstriped, though the heart is an exception to this. Hollow organs whose walls are notably muscular, as the heart, intestine, bladder, and womb, are called hollow muscles. Striped or voluntary muscle is sometimes called muscle of animal life, as distinguished from unstriped involuntary muscle of organic life.

Aponeurotic or fascial investment of Muscles of Right Arm. f, flexor; d, deltoid; b, biceps; c, supinator longus.

Principal Muscles of the Human Body.

3. A part, organ, or tissue, of whatever histological character, which has the property of contractility, and is thus capable of motion in itself.—4. Figuratively, muscular strength; brawn; as, a man of muscle.—Active insufficiency of a muscle. See insufficiency.—Alary muscles, in insects, delicate fan-shaped muscles in the upper part of the abdomen, each pair uniting by the expanded portion below the dorsal vessel or heart; collectively they have been called the pericardial septum. Their function appears to be to promote the circulation of the blood by altering the size of the pericardial cavity.—Amatorial muscles. See amatorial.—Appendicular muscles, those which belong to the appendicular skeleton; muscles of the limbs.—Artificial muscle, an elastic band of caoutchouc worn to supply the place of or to supplement the action of some paralyzed or weakened muscle.—Axial muscles, those which belong to the axial skeleton; muscles of the trunk, including the head and tail.—Canine, giliary, dermal, etc., muscles. See the adjectives.—Cribriform muscles, a name given by Darwin to the orbicularis palpebrarum, corrugator supercilii, pyramidalis nasi, and several anterior parts of the occipitofrontalis muscles, which draw the features into an expression of grief.—Cribriform muscle, the levator anguli oris, one of the muscles of expression.—Hilton's muscle. [After the anatomist Hilton.] The lower aryepiglottic or inferior aryepiglottoid muscle, called by Hilton compressor aeneuli laryngis.—Hornor's muscle. [After the anatomist Hornor.] The tensor tarsi, a very small muscle at the inner side of the orbit, inserted into the tarsal cartilage of the eyelids.—Hypaxial, hypotenar, etc., muscles. See the adjectives.—Intercostal muscles, two sets of muscles, the external and the internal, their fibers crossing each other obliquely, connecting the adjacent margins of the ribs throughout nearly their whole extent. They are concerned in the act of respiration.—Kissing-muscle, the orbicular muscle or sphincter of the mouth; technically called the orbicularis oris, ocularis, and buccinator.—Müller's palpebral muscle. [After H. M. Müller.] A layer of smooth muscular fibers in either lid, inserted near the attached margin of the tarsus and innervated through the cervical sympathetic.—Muscles of deglutition, or mastication, etc. See deglutition, mastication, etc.—Orbicular, pyramidal, quadratus, etc., muscles. See the adjectives.—Snarling-muscle, the levator labii superioris, as of the dog, which, when it acts displays the teeth, as in snarling.—Smiling-muscle, the human levator labii superioris alaeque nasi, which acts in the expression of smiling. (For other muscles, see their special names.)

muscle, n. See muscle.

muscle-band, n. See muscle-band.

musclebill (mus'1-bil), n. The surf-scooter, a duck, (Eiduna perspicillata, G. Trumbull, [Kennebunk, Maine].)

muscle-case (mus'1-kās), n. A muscle-compartment.

muscle-casket (mus'1 kās'ket), n. A fun compartment.

muscle-cell (mus'1-sel), n. A cell from which muscular tissue is derived; a myonema; a myocyte.

The connection with the muscle-cells.

(C. Claus, Zool. (trans.), p. 45.)

muscle-clot (mus'1-klot), n. The substance formed as a clot in the coagulation of muscle-plasma; myosin.

muscle-column (mus'1-kol'um), n. 1. A bundle of muscular fibers.—2. A muscle-prism.

muscle-compartment (mus'1-kom-pārt'ment), n. The prismatic space bounded at both ends by Krause's membrane (intermediate disk) and laterally by the longitudinal planes which mark out Cohnheim's areas. It is occupied by a muscle-prism. Also muscle-case, muscle-casket.

muscle-corpucle (mus'1-kōr'pus-l), n. A muscle-nucleus, especially in a striated muscle.

muscle-current (mus'1-kur'ant), n. See current.

musclod (mus'ld), n. [muscle + -ed]. Having muscles or muscular tissue; muscled; used in composition: as, a strong-musclod man.

muscle-nucleus (mus'1-nū'klē-us), n. A nucleus of a muscle-fiber. In the striated muscles of mammals these are usually placed on the inner surface of the sarcolemma.

muscle-plasm (mus'1-plāzm), n. The liquid expressed from muscle minced and mixed while living with snow and a little salt. It coagulates, forming a clot (myosin) and muscle-serum.

muscle-plate (mus'1-plāt), n. A primitive segment of the mesoderm of an embryo destined to become a muscle or series of muscles; a myonema, myomere, or myotome. Also called muscular plate.

Most of the voluntary muscles of the body are developed from a series of portions of mesoderm which are termed the muscle-plates. Quain, Anat., II. 132.

muscle-plum (mus'1-plūm), n. A dark-purple plum. Hallucell.

muscle-prism (mus'1-prizm), n. The prismatic mass of muscle-rods occupying a muscle-compartment.

muscle-reading (mus'1-rē'ding), n. The detection and interpretation of slight involuntary contractions of the muscles by a person whose hand is placed upon the subject of experimentation.

In the researches I made on muscle-reading, it was shown over and over that by pure chance only the blindfold subject would, under certain conditions, find the object looked for in one case, and sometimes in two cases out of twelve. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 17.

muscle-rod (mus'1-rōd), n. A segment of a muscle-fibrilla between two successive Krause's membranes (intermediate disks).

muscle-serum (mus'1-sē'rūm), n. The serum formed on the coagulation of muscle-plasma.

muscle-sugar (mus'1-shūg'ūr), n. Inositol.

muscling (mus'ling), n. [muscle + -ing]. Exhibition or representation of the muscles.

A good piece, the painters say, must have good muscling, as well as colouring and drapery. Sheddenbury.

muscold (mus'kold), a. and n. [L. musculus, (see moss), moss, + Gr. ῥιζορ, form.] I. a. In bot., moss-like; resembling moss. Also muscliform.

II. n. One of the mosses; a moss-like plant.

musculological (mus-kol'jō'j-ikl), n. [musculology + -al]. Belonging or pertaining to musculology.

musculologist (mus-kol'jō-jist), n. [musculology + -ist]. One skilled in the science of musculology; a bryologist.

The tribe of Sphagnaceae, or Bog-Mosses, is now separated by Muscologists from true Mosses.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 333.

musculology (mus-kol'jō-jī), n. [= F. musculologie, L. musculus, moss, + Gr. -λογία, -logia, speak; see -ology]. The branch of botany that treats of mosses; also, a discourse or treatise on mosses. Also called bryology.

muscosity (mus-kō'si-ti), n. [L. muscosus, mossy, muscus, moss (see moss), + -ity]. Mossiness.

muscovado (mus-kō-vā'dō), n. [Also muscovada, = F. muscovade, muscovade, Sp. muscovada, muscovada, muscovada, muscovada, for azúcar muscovado, inferior or unrefined sugar.] Unrefined sugar; the raw material from which loaf-sugar and lump-sugar are prepared by refining. Muscovado is obtained from the juice of the sugar cane by evaporation and draining off the liquid part called molasses.

Muscovite (mus'kō-vit), n. and a. [Formerly also Muscovite; F. Muscovite, now Muscovite = Sp. Muscovita = D. Moskoviet = G. Moskoviet = Sw. Dan. Moskovit; as Muscovy (M.L. Muscovia), Russia (L. Russa, Moskova) (G. Moskau, F. Moscou), Moscow, + -ite.] I. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Muscovy or the principality of Moscow, or, by extension, of Russia.—2. [f. c.] In mineral, common or potash mica (see mica), a silicate of aluminium and potassium, with the latter element in part replaced by hydrogen; the light-colored mica, varying from nearly white to pale smoky brown, which is characteristic of granite, gneiss, and other related crystalline rocks; formerly called Muscovy glass. In granite veins it sometimes occurs in plates of great size and is often mined, as for example in western North Carolina. In thin plates it is used in stove windows, etc. When ground up it is used as a lubricator, for giving a silvery sheen to wall-paper, etc. Muscovite is a variety of muscovite containing more silica than the common kinds. The name hydromica or hydromuscovite is sometimes given to the varieties which yield considerable water on ignition. These usually have a pearly or silky luster and a talc-like feel, and are less elastic than the less hydrous kinds: damonite, margarodite, and sericite are here included. Fuchsite is a green-colored variety of muscovite containing chromium. In 1867 the production of mica (muscovite) in the United States was about 50,000 pounds, valued at nearly $150,000. 2,000 tons of mica waste, valued at $15,000, were ground for use. (Mine Resources of the U. S., 1867.)

3. [f. c.] The desman or Muscovite rat.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Muscovy, or Moscow, a former principality in central Russia, and the nucleus of the Russian empire; by extension, of or pertaining to Russia.

I have used the word Muscovite in the sense of "pertaining to the Tsardom of Muscovy" and Muscovite in the sense of "pertaining to the town of Moscow."

D. M. Walker, Russia, p. 439.

Muscovitic (mus-kō-vit'ik), a. [Muscovite + -ic]. Same as Muscovite.

Muscovy (mus'kō-vi), n.; pl. muscovies (-vīz). [Short for Muscovy duck (see musk-duck).] A Muscovy duck or musk-duck. See duck, 1, and musk-duck, 1.

Muscovy glass. See muscovite, 2.

She wore an excellent lady but that her face peeped like Muscovy glass. Merton and Wheeler, Malcontent, I. 2.

muscular (mus'kū-lār), a. [= F. musculaire, = Sp. Pg. muscular = It. musculare, musculare, NL. "muscularis", of muscle, L. musculus, muscle: see muscle.] 1. Of or pertaining in any way to muscle or muscles; composing, constituting, or consisting of muscle: as, the muscular system; muscular origin or insertion; muscular fiber or tissue.—2. Done by or dependent upon muscle or muscles: as, muscular action; muscular movement; muscular strength.—3. Well muscled; having well-developed muscles; strong; sinewy; brawny; as, a muscular man.—4. Figuratively, strong and vigorous.

No mind becomes muscular without rude and early exercises. Rutherford, My Novel, II. 12.

Muscular Christianity. See Christianity. [The origin of this phrase has been generally attributed to Charles Kingsley; but he expressly repudiates it.]

We have heard much of late about "Muscular Christianity." A clever expression, spoken in jest by I know not whom, has been bandied about the world, and supposed by many to represent some new ideal of the Christian character. For myself, I do not know what it means. Lectures and Memorials of Charles Kingsley, II. 212.]

Muscular fasciola, fasciculus, or lacertus, a bundle of a variable number of parallel muscular fibers.—Muscular fiber. (a) Muscular tissue, as composed of fibers. (b) One of the fibers of which muscular tissue is ultimately composed. Muscular fibril, fibrillation. See the nouns.—Muscular impression, the mark of the insertion of a muscle, as of an adductor muscle on the inner surface of a bivalve shell. See cut at cardium. Muscular insertion, one of the attachments of an individual muscle generally; that inserted in the smaller or more movable part. Muscular motion, muscular movement, the motion or movement which results from the action of muscles. Muscular plate. Same as muscle plate.—Muscular rheumatism. Same as myalgia.—Muscular sensations, feelings which accompany the action of the muscles. (James Mill, 1820.) By these a knowledge is obtained of the condition of the muscles, and the extent to which they are contracted, of the position of various parts of the body, and of the resistance offered by external bodies.—Muscular sense, muscular sensation, or the capacity of experiencing them, especially considered as a means of information. Muscular stomach, a stomach with thick muscular walls, as the gizzard of a fowl; distinguished from the glandular stomach, or proventriculus.—Muscular system, the total of the muscular tissue or sum of the individual muscles of the body; musculation or musculation, regarded as a set of similar organs or system of like parts, comparable to the vascular system, the osseous system, etc. Muscular tissue, the proper contractile substance of muscle; muscular fiber. It is of two kinds—striated or striped muscle, and smooth. The former, of which all the ordinary muscles of the trunk and limbs and the heart are composed, consists of bundles

Illustrated Muscular Tissue, magnified about 500 diameters. A, a single fiber without its sarcolemma, breaking up at one end into its fibrils; B, two separate fibrils; C, a muscular fiber (breaking up into fibrils); D, a non-striated fiber of which the sarcolemma sustains it; E, it torn across, while the sarcolemma (F) has not given way.

of fibers which present a striated appearance, and are enveloped in and bound together by connective tissue which also supports the vessels and nerves of the muscle. Striated muscle-fibers, except those of the heart, have an outer sheath of sarcolemma. Smooth muscular tissue consists of elongated band-like non-striated fibers, each with a rod-like nucleus; they do not break up into fibrils, and have no sarcolemma. Muscular tube, in fish, a myodome, s. syn. 3. sinewy, stalwart, sturdy, lusty, vigorous, powerful.

muscularity (mus-kū-lār'it-i), n. [muscular + -ity]. The state, quality, or condition of being muscular.

muscularize (mus'kū-lār'īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. muscularized, ppr. muscularizing. [muscular + -ize]. To make muscular or strong; develop muscular strength in. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 5.

muscularly (mus'kū-lār'īl), adv. With muscular power; strongly; as regards muscular strength.

musculation (mus-kū-lā'shon), n. [= F. musculation; as L. musculus, muscle, + -ation.] The musculography (mū-sūl-ŏf-ŏ-jī), n. [< musculology + -graphy] One version in musculology.

musculology (mū-sūl-ŏf-ŏ-jī), n. [< NL. musculus, muscle, + (Gr. -logia, < logos, speak: see -ology)] The science of arranging and managing museums. Also musculogy. [Recent.]

But the account of the last general arrangements of the several museums is generally unsatisfactory and imperfect, while very slight or no mention is made of such devices as are characteristically American, and in which musculology has been notably advanced by us.

Science, VI, 32.

muser (mū'zēr), n. One who muses; one who acts, speaks, or writes as in a reverie; an absent-minded person.

He (Arnold) is not, like most elegiac poets, a mere sad muser; he is always one who finds a secret of joy in the midst of pain.

Contemporary Rev., XLIX, 333.

musé-rid (mū'zē-rid), a. Ridden by a Muse or the Muses; possessed by poetical enthusiasm. [Rare.]

No meagre, Musé-rid mope, adust and thin,
In a dun night-gown of his own loose skin.

Pope, Dunciad, II, 37.

muset (mū'set), n. [Also musit; dim. of musé.] Same as musé, 1.

The many musets through which he (the hare) goes
Are like a labyrinth to amaze his foes.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 383.

musette (mū-zet'), n. [F., dim. of OF. musc, a pipe, a bagpipe, = IL. musa, < ML. musa, a bagpipe, < L. musa, a song, a Muse: see Muse.] 1. A small and simple variety of oboe. — 2. A form of bagpipe once very popular in France, having a compass of from ten to thirteen tones. — 3. A quiet pastoral melody, usually with a drone-bass, written in imitation of a bagpipe tune; often introduced as one of the parts of the old-fashioned suite, especially as a contrast to the gavotte. Such melodies were often used as dance-tunes, and thus the term musette was extended to the dance for which they were used.

muséum (mū-zē-um), n. [F., muséum, musée = Sp. museo = Port. muséu = It. museo, < L. musaeum, < Gr. musaeion, a temple of the Muses, a place of study, a library or museum, also (late) monastic, < ancien, a Muse: see Muse.] A building or part of a building appropriated as a repository of things that have an immediate relation to literature, art, or science; especially and usually, a collection of objects in natural history, or of antiquities or curiosities. Among the leading museums may be mentioned — in Italy, the Vatican (developed largely from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries) and the Capitoline at Rome, the Uffizi and Pitti Palace at Florence, the great Museo Nazionale at Naples, and the Brera at Milan; in France the Louvre (perhaps the most important in the world, opened 1793), the Luxembourg (devoted to recent art), the Trocadéro, and the Hôtel de Clugny at Paris; in Germany, the Zwinger (founded in the eighteenth century at Dresden), the museums of Berlin, and the Glyptothek and Pinakothek at Munich; in Great Britain the Ashmolean at Oxford (opened 1683) and the British Museum (the largest in the country, founded 1753) and the South Kensington Museum (illustrative of the industrial arts) at London. There are very notable museums at St. Petersburg, at Madrid, and at Athens; and the museum at Ghent (formerly Louvain), near Cairo, has a world-wide reputation. In the United States the chief museums are the Museum of Fine Arts at Boston, the Metropolitan Museum at New York, and the National Museum at Washington. The meaning to the term muséum is sometimes extended especially on the continent of Europe, to include galleries of pictures and sculpture.

mush (mush), n. [*Prob. orig. a dial. var. of mush², var. of mush¹, a mixture: see mush¹. Not < G. mus, pap.] 1. Anything mashed. Halliw. [Prov. Eng. 1—2] Meal boiled in water or milk until it forms a thick, soft mass; as, oatmeal mush; mush and milk; specifically, such a preparation made from Indian corn: hasty-pudding.*

In thickness like a cane, it Nature rail'd
Close up in leaves, to keep it from the cold
Which being ground and boiled, Mush they make

Herbie, Last Voyage to Bermuda (1671). (Bartlett.)

Even in thy native regions, how I blush
To hear the Pennsylvanians call thee Mush!

Jad Barine, Hasty Pudding, 1.

Why will people cook it (rice) into a mush? See how separate the grains are!

W. M. Baker, New Timothy p. 19.

2. Something resembling mush, as being soft and pulpy; as, mush of mud.

I hate, where I looked for a manly furtherance, or at least a manly resistance, to find a mush of corruption.

Emerson, Friendship.

3. Fish ground up; chum; pomace; stool.

— 4. Dust; dusty refuse. Halliw. [Prov.]

Eng. — 5. The best kind of iron ore. Halliw. [Prov. Eng.] mush¹ (mush), v. t. [Perhaps a var. of mush², v.] To nick or notch (dress-fabric) round the edges with a stamp, for ornament.

mashed (mash), a. [< mush¹ + -ed]. Shattered; depressed; "used up." [Prov. Eng.]

(Going about all day without changing her cap, and looking as if she was mashed.)

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, III, 2.

mushetron, n. An obsolete form of mushroom.

mushetour, n. In her., same as mushetron.

mushquash-root, n. See musquash-root.

mushroom (mush'rum), n. and a. [Also dial. or obs. mushrome, mushrump, musheron; < ME. musheron, musheron, < OF. musheron, musheron, a mushroom, < moisier, mois: see mush¹.]

1. A cryptogamic plant of the class Fungi; applied in a general sense to almost any of the larger, conspicuous fungi, such as toadstools, puffballs, Hydnei, etc., but more particularly to the agaricoid fungi and especially to the edible forms. The species most usually cultivated is the Agaricus campestris, edible agaric or mushroom. Mushrooms are found in all parts of the world, and are usually of very rapid growth. In some localities they form a staple article of food. In Tierra del Fuego the natives live largely upon Cyatharia Baromet, and in Australia many species of Bolus are used as food by the natives. Many mushrooms are poisonous, and the selection of those suitable for cooking should be intrusted to competent judges. See art under Agaricus.

Rather the Emperor (Laudius repaired, in hope to recover his health through the temperature of the air . . . but contrarily here met with the mushrooms that poisoned him.

Sandys, Travels, p. 236.

Hence — 2. An upstart; one who rises rapidly from a low condition in life.

But cannot break a night grown mushrump,
Such a one as my lord of Cornwall is Should bear us down of the nobility

Marlowe, Edward II., l. 4.

And we must glorify
A mushroom! one of yesterday!

R. Johnson, Catharine, II, 1.

3. A small mushroom-shaped protuberance that sometimes forms on the end of the negative carbon in arc lamps. Cup-mushroom, a common name for certain discolorations fungi, particularly of the genus Peziza, see Discomycota and Peziza. Devil's mushroom, a name given to many poisonous fungi resembling edible mushrooms. [Colloq.] Fairy-ring mushroom, see Claviceps and Moravicus. St. George's mushroom, a species of mushroom, Agaricus umbonatus, which appears in May and June, growing in the grass. The name is also given to A. arvensis.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to mushrooms; made of mushrooms; as, mushroom sauce. — 2. Resembling mushrooms in rapidity of growth and in insubstantiality; ephemeral; upstart; as, mushroom aristocracy.

Somewhat buys all the quick medicines that build palaces for the mushroom, say rather the twinkled, millionaires.

O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 108.

Mush-room anchor, catchup, coral, etc. See the nouns.

Mushroom head, the nose-plate on the inner part of the breech plug of a breech-loading cannon. See nose plate, and see end and under fermature.

mushroom (mush'rum), v. t. [< mushroom, n.] To elevate suddenly in position or rank.

The prosperous upstart mushroomed into rank.

Richardson, Charles Harlowe, l. 267. (Davies.)

mushroom-hitches (mush'rum hitch'ez), n. pl. Inequalities in the floor of a coal mine, occasioned by the projection of basaltic or other stony substances. Halliw. [Prov. Eng.] mushroom-spawn (mush'rum-spawn), n. The substance in which the reproductive mycelium of the mushroom is embodied.

mushroom-stone (mush'rum-stōn), n. A stone or fossil that resembles a mushroom.

Two small mushroom stones, in form of a bluish cone . . . Fifteen other mushroom stones of neat the same shape with the precedent. . . These are of a white colour, and in shape exactly resembling a sort of coraline fungus of marine original, which I have by me.

Woodward, On Fossils, p. 187.

mushroom-strainer (mush'rum-strā'nēr), n. An inverted-fish strainer for eastern-pumps, so named from its shape. E. H. Knight.

mushroom-sugar (mush'rum-shūg'ār), n. Manilla.

mushru (mush'ru), n. [Hind. mushru'a.] A washable material made in India, having a glossy silk finish and a cotton back. It is used for wearing-apparel, and is very durable.

mushrump (mush'rump), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of mushroom.

mushy (mush'y), a. [< mush¹ + -y]. Like mush; soft; pulpy; without fiber or firmness.

The death penalty is disappearing, like some better things, before a kind of mushy and unthinking doubt of its morality and expediency. The Nation, Feb. 3, 1874, p. 67.

A child-bearing, tender-hearted thing in the woman of our people; . . . she's not mushy, but her heart is tender.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xvi.

Over-ripe, mushy, bruised, and partially decayed fruit makes a poor dark-colored dried product.

Am. Amer., N. A., LXI, 323.

music (mu'zik), n. [< ME. musik, musyk, musike = D. musick, musyk = MLG. Mīg, musike = G. Dan. Sw. musick, < OF. (and F.) musique = Sp. musica = Port. It. musica, < L. musica = Ar. musiqā = Turk. Hind. musiq, < Gr. μουσική (sc. τέχνη), any art over which the Muses presided, esp. lyric poetry set to melody, music; form of μουσική, of the Muses (3 μουσική, a votary of the Muses, a poet, musician, man of letters), < μουσα, a Muse; see Muse.] 1. Any pleasing succession of sounds or combinations of sounds; melody; harmony; as, the music of the winds, or of the sea.

For the army
And sweet accord was no good music
That the noise to angels must was like.

Flower and Leaf.

In sweet music is such art,
Killing care and grief of heart
Fall asleep, or hearing die.

Shak., Ham., VIII, III, 1 (song).

When those exact co-ordinations which the ear perceives as rhythm, time, and tone-color are suggested to the ear by a series of musical sounds, the result is music.

S. Lister, Sci. Eng. Verse, p. 44.

The bird doth not betray the secret springs
Whence note on note her music sweetly pours.

James Ferry, Poems, p. 22.

2. (a) The science of combining tones in rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic order, so as to produce effects that shall be intelligible and agreeable to the ear. (b) The art of using rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic materials in the production of definite compositions, or works having scientific correctness, artistic finish and proportion, esthetic effectiveness, and an emotional content or meaning.

In Cælia due Crisla was musically first found, and also fourtye and exte type of amies on yesterday.

Sir R. Guiford, P. Laryngology, p. 12.

Music has been developed according to certain rules which depended on unknown laws of nature since discovered. . . . It cannot be separated from these laws, and within them there is a field large enough for all the efforts of human fancy.

Blaserna, Sound, p. 187.

Degrees in music are not conferred by the University of London.

Gray's Inst. Mus., II, 1, 222.

3. A composition made up of tones artistically and scientifically disposed, or such compositions collectively; as, a piece of music. Music is classified and named with respect to its origin or general style as barbarous, popular, national, artistic, sacred, secular, etc., with respect to its technical form as melodic, harmonic, polyphonic or contrapuntal, homophonic, Gregorian, classical, romantic, strict, free, lyric, epic, dramatic, pastoral, measurable, figured, etc.; with respect to its method of performance as vocal, instrumental, solo, choral, or orchestral, concerted, etc., and with respect to its application as ecclesiastical or church, theatrical, operatic, military, or of concert, chamber, dance-music, etc.

His (Florentine) sense of the resources and the "cabaletta," though sometimes carried to excess, gave a brilliancy to his music which added greatly to the excellence of its effect.

Bryce, Brit., XX, 331.

4. A musical composition as rendered by instruments or by the voice.

Some to Church reply,
Not for the doctrine, but the music there.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 344.

5. The art of producing melody or harmony by means of the voice or of instruments.

Also there shall be one Teacher of Music, and to play one the Lute, the Bandura, and Cytherne.

Book of Proverbs (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), l. 7.

6. The written or printed score of a composition; also, such scores collectively; as, a book of music; music for the piano or the flute. — 7. A company of performers of music; a band; an orchestra.

I was one of the music, ah!

Fletcher, Wife for a Month, II, 6.

8. Pleasurable emotion, such as is produced by melodious and harmonious sounds; also, the source, cause, or occasion of such emotion.

Such Musick is wise words, with true contentment.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, II, 2.

The grass and the leaves which make
The music of the march of life.

W. H. Miller, Last Walk in Autumn.

9. Lively speech or action; liveliness; excited wrangling; excitement. [Colloq., U. S.] — 10. Diversion; sport; also, sense of the ridiculous. In this sense apparently confused with amuse; compare musical, 5. [New Eng.] — 11. Broken, cathedral, church, congregational music. See the qualifying words. — Dynamics of music. See dynamic.—Florida, Gregorian, janizary music. See the qualifying words. — Magical music, a game in which some article is hidden, to be sought for by one of the company, who is partly guided by the music of some instrument which is played fast as he approaches the place of concealment and more slowly as he wanders from it.

A pleasant game, she thought, she liked it more Than magic music, for she felt, all the rest
Tennyson, Princess, Prolog.

Martial music. Two martial. — Measurable, measured, mensurable music. See measurable, 2. Military music. See military. — Music of the future, a phrase first used by Richard Wagner to express an elaborate combination of poetic, musical, dramatic, and scenic art into extended works, but often used in a narrower sense as descriptive of a musical style similar to that of Wagner.

Music of the spheres. See harmony of the spheres, under harmony. — Music trade-mark. See trade-mark. — Organic music. See organic. — Program music, music intended to convey to the hearer, by means of instruments and without the use of words, a description or suggestion of definite objects, scenes, or events. The term is often very vaguely used. — To face the music. See face. — Turkish music. Same as janizary music.

music (mū'zīk), v. t. [< music, n.] To entice or seduce with music.

A man must put a mean valuation upon Christ to leave him for a touch upon an instrument, and a faint idea of future torments to be filled and mused in hell.
Gentleman Instructed, p. 135. (Davies.)

musica (mū'zī-kā), n. [L. and It.: see music.] Music. — Musica facta, falsa, or colorata, false or feigned music; a term applied in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries to music in which accidental or notes foreign to the scale of the mode were introduced for the sake of euphony.

musical (mū'zī-kəl), a. and n. [*< F. Sp. Pg. musical = It. musicale, < NL. musicalis, < L. musica, music; see music.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to music, in any sense; of the nature of music; as, musical proportion. — 2. Sounding agreeably; affecting the ear pleasantly; conformable to the laws of the science of music; conformable to the principles of the art of music; melodious; harmonious.

As sweet and musical
As bright Apollo's lute.
Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 342.

All little sounds made musical and clear
Beneath the sky that burning August gives,
While yet the thought of glorious summer lives.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 875.

3. Pertaining to the performance or the notation of music. — 4. Fond of music; discriminating with regard to music; as, the child is musical, or has a musical ear. — 5. Amusing; ridiculous. [Blang. New Eng.] Musical box, a mechanical musical instrument, consisting essentially of a barrel or cylinder, caused to revolve by clockwork, in the surface of which are small pegs or pins, so arranged as to catch and twang the teeth of a kind of steel comb. These teeth are graduated in size, and carefully tuned; and the disposition of the pins is such as to sound them in perfect melodic succession and rhythm, so that even very elaborate music may be faithfully reproduced. The position of the barrel may usually be slightly shifted from side to side, so that more than one tune can be played from the same barrel; and sometimes more than one barrel is provided for the same box, so that an extensive repertoire is possible. Occasionally small bells, or even small reeds blown by a bellows, as in the hand organ, are added to increase the resources of the instrument. The effects produced are often very pleasing and varied. Musical characters. See character. Musical clock, a clock to which a musical box or barrel organ is so attached as to play tunes at certain periods. Musical condenser, a condenser to the terminal plates of which the wires from a telephone transmitter are attached. When a musical sound is produced in the neighborhood of the transmitter, it is reproduced by the condenser. Musical director, the conductor, director, or leader of a choir, chorus, band, or orchestra. Also called music director. — Musical drama. See opera. — Musical ear. See ear, 5. — Musical glasses. See glass. — Musical harvest-fest, the Crucifix. — Musical notation. See notation. Musical progression. Same as harmonic progression (which see, under harmonic). — Musical scale. See scale.

II. n. A meeting or a party for a musical entertainment; same as musical.

Such fashionable cant terms as theatricals and musicals, invented by the flippant Topham, still survive among his confraternity of frivolity.
F. D. Lush, Curios. of Lit., III. 346.

musicale (mū'zī-kāl'), n. [< F. musicale (source musicale, a musical party), fem. of musical, musical; see musical.] A performance or concert of music, vocal or instrumental, or both, usually of a private character; a private concert.

music-house (mū'zī-k-hous), n. 1. A house where public musical entertainments are given.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, the professional musicians assembled at certain houses in the metropolis, called music-houses, where they performed concerts, consisting of vocal and instrumental music, for the entertainment of the public.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 342.

2. A firm or other business concern dealing in printed music, or musical instruments, or both.

musician (mū'zī-shi-an), n. [Early mod. E. also musician; < F. musicien; as music + -ian.] One who makes music a profession or otherwise devotes himself to it, whether as composer, performer, critic, theorist, or historian.

The praise of Bach has been the sweet musician's song.
Dryden, Alexander's Feast, l. 47.

musicianer (mū'zī-shi-an'ēr), n. [< musician + -er.] Same as musician. [Obsolete or colloq.]

Musicianer I had always associated with the millitars of my boyhood, and too hastily concluded it an abbreviation of our own, but Mr. Wright tells it a Norfolk word, and I find it to be as old as 1692 by an extract in Collier.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., Int.

musicianly (mū'zī-shi-an'ē-lē), a. [< musician + -ly.] Having, exhibiting, or illustrating the properties of good music, or the skill and taste of a good musician.

musicianship (mū'zī-shi-an'ship), n. [< musician + -ship.] Skill in musical composition or expression; musical acquirements.

As a whole, "St. Polycarp" is a work which bears testimony both to the thorough musicianship and to the natural gifts of its composer. Athenaeum, No. 3178, p. 392.

musicless (mū'zī-k-lēs'), a. [< music + -less.] Unmusical; inharmonious.

Their musicless instruments are frames of brass hung about with rings which they jingle in ships according to their marchings. Sketches, Travellers, p. 172. (Davies.)

music-loft (mū'zī-k-lōft'), n. Same as organ-loft.

music-mad (mū'zī-k-mad'), a. Inordinately and morbidly devoted to the study or pursuit of music; affected by musicomania.

music-master (mū'zī-k-mās'tēr), n. A male teacher of music.

musicodramatic (mū'zī-kō-dra-ma'tik'), a. Combining music and the drama; at once dramatic and musical.

His opera, although by no means written "with a purpose," represented an entirely new type of music-dramatic art.
Quarterly Rev., CXLVI. 61.

musicography (mū'zī-kog'ra-fē), n. [< Gr. μουσική, music, + γραφή, write.] The science or art of writing music out in legible characters; musical notation.

musicomania (mū'zī-kō-mā'nē-ā), n. [= F. musicomanie = It. musicomania, < NL. musicomania, < Gr. μουσική, music, + μανία, mania.] In pathol., a variety of monomania in which the intellectual faculties are deranged by an absorbing passion for music. Dungham. Also called musomania.

music-paper (mū'zī-k-pā'pēr), n. Paper ruled with staves for recording music.

music-pen (mū'zī-k-pen), n. An instrument consisting of a wooden handle and a piece of brass so bent upon itself as to make five small channels or gutters. When the channels are filled with ink and the pen is drawn across paper, five parallel lines are made, which constitute a staff for writing music.

music-rack (mū'zī-k-rak'), n. A rack or inclined shelf attached to a musical instrument, or mounted upon an independent support, designed to hold the music for a singer or player. Also called music-holder.

music-recorder (mū'zī-k-rē-kōr'dēr), n. A device for recording music as it is played on any sort of keyed instrument, as the organ or piano-forte. Mr. Fenby's recorder, named by him a phonograph, does this by means of a stud attached to the under side of each key. When the key is pressed down, the stud comes in contact with a spring, which in turn sets in action an electromagnetic apparatus, which causes a tracer to press against a fillet of chemically prepared paper moving at a uniform rate. The arrangement is such as to denote the length and character of the notes. Abbé Volpino's phonograph records notes by means of a pencil attached to a kind of spheroidal drum, which vibrates when any musical notes are sounded, whether by the mouth or by an instrument.

music-roll (mū'zī-k-rōl'), n. Same as music-case, 2.

musicry (mū'zī-k-rē), n. [< music + -ry.] Music. Marston, Scourge of Villainie, xi. 131.

Rogge, Brit., XI. 606.

musit, n. An obsolete form of musket for music.

musition, n. An obsolete spelling of musician.

musive (mū'ziv'), a. [= F. musif, < LL. musivus, < Gr. μουσικός, mosaic; see museum and mosaic.] Same as mosaic.

According to the cones (of the pollen) to be arranged somewhat in the form of horizontal cells in a honeycomb, this (a hundred or more) outlines seen between two very close parallel lines on a white ground) has been explained by supposing that the retinal image of such a line is so small that, as it falls large this would surface, one minute section of it would excite only one cone, while the sections immediately above and below would cover halves of two adjacent cones, and, exciting both to activity, would appear twice as large.

muscid, n. Same as muscid.
musk (mus'k), n. [ME. musk, < OF. musc, F. musc = Fr. musc = Sp. musco (obs., the usual term being almizcle = Pg. almizcle, almiscar, from the Ar., with Ar. art.) = It. musco, muschio = D. muskus = G. muschus = Sw. muskus = Dan. muskus, moskus, < L.L. muscus, ML. also muschus, < Gr. μύσχος, < Ar. musk, mus, mus = Turk. misk, < Pers. musk, mus = Hind. musk, mus, < Skt. muska, testicle, prob. < √ musk, stem, whence also ult. mouse. Hence ult. muscut, muscatel, muscadell, muscadine, etc., and the second element of nutmeg.] 1. An odoriferous substance secreted by the male musk-deer, Moschus moschiferus. See musk-deer. The secretion is a viscid fluid, which dries as a brown pulverulent substance, of a slightly bitter taste and extremely powerful, penetrating, and persistent odor. It is the strongest and most lasting of perfumes, and is also used in medicine as a diffusible stimulant and antispasmodic. The commercial article is imported from Asia in the natural pods or bags, frequently mixed with blood, fat, and hairs, and adulterated with foreign substances. Various other animals secrete a substance like musk, and several are named from this fact. See compounds following.

Which the hunters (at that time chasing the said beast) doe cut off, and drie against the sunne, and it prometh the best Muske in the world. Perrhas, Pilgrimage, p. 428.

That old and cur'd Assyrian Hall
Smelling of musk and of innocence.
Tempsam, Maud, vi. 6

2. A kind of artificial musk made by the action of nitric acid upon oil of amber.—3. The smell of musk, or a smell resembling it; an aromatic smell; a perfume.

The woodbine spleen are wafted abroad,
And the musk of the rose is blown.
Tempsam, Maud, xii. 1

4. Same as musk-plant, in both senses.

musk (mus'k), v. t. [< musk, n.] To perfume with musk.

muskallonge (mus'ka-lonj), n. See muskallong.

muskatt, n. An obsolete form of muscat.

musk-bag (mus'k'bag), n. 1. A small bag containing musk and other perfumes, sometimes used as a sachet. Closet of Rarities (1706). (Nares).—2. The pod, pouch, or cyst of the musk-deer which contains the musk.

musk-ball (mus'k'bál), n. A ball of orange substance impregnated with musk and other perfumes, kept among garments after the manner of a sachet to perfume them.

Curious musk-balls to carry about one, or to lay in any place. Accomplish'd Female Instructor (1719). (Nares) musk-beaver (mus'k'hé-vér), n. The muskrat, Fiber zibethicus.

musk-beetle (mus'k'bétl), n. A cerambycid beetle, Callischroma moschatus. See cut under Cerambyx.

musk-cake (mus'k'kák), n. Musk, rose-leaves, and other ingredients made into a cake. Closet of Rarities (1706). (Nares) musk-cat (mus'k'kat), n. A civet cat; figuratively, a scented, effeminate person; a fop.

Here is a pair of fortune's air, or of fortune's cat—but not a musk cat.
Shak, All's Well, c. 2. 21.

Away, musk-cat! B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

musk-cattle (mus'k'kát'), n. pl. Musk-oxen.

musk-cavy (mus'k'káv), n. A West Indian rodent of the family Detomidae, subfamily Ech- musk-cod (mus'k'kód), n. A musk-bag; hence, figuratively, a scented fop.

It's a sweet musk-cod, a pure spic'd gull.
Dickens, Satiricist.

musk-deer (mus'k'dér), n. 1. A small ruminant, Moschus moschiferus, of the family Cervidae and subfamily Moschidae, the male of which yields the scent called musk. These little deer inhabit the elevated plateaus and mountain ranges of central Asia, especially the Altai chain. The male is about 3 feet long and 20 inches high, hairless, with long canine teeth and coarse pelage of a dirty brown color, whitish underneath. The doe is smaller, and has no musk. The gland or bag of the male which contains the perfume is of about the size of a hen's egg, of an oval form flattened on one side. It is an accessory sexual organ.

2. In an improper use, a tragulid, chevrotain, or kanchil, small ruminants of the family Tragulidae. They superficially resemble musk deer, but belong to a different family. The males are horned, and have no musk.—Musk-deer plant. See Simona.

musk-duck (mus'k'duk), n. 1. A duck, Ardea moschata, of the family Anatidae and subfamily Anatinae, commonly but erroneously known as the musquetry and Barbary duck. It is a native of tropical America, now domesticated everywhere. It is larger than the mallard, and the upper parts are of a glossy greenish-black color.

2. A duck of the genus Rizura, as R. lobata of Australia; so called from the musky odor of the male.

muskeg (mus'kég), n. [Amer. Ind.] A bog; a soft mossy or peaty spot. [Canada.]

muskelt, n. An obsolete form of muscle for musket.

muskely, n. [< musket + y.] Muscular.

Musky, or of muscles, hard and stiff with many muscles or brawns.

Witold, Dick (ed. 1808) p. 404. (Nares)

muskett (mus'két), n. [Also musquet; < ME. musket, muskytte, < OF. musket, mosquet, moschet, monschet, mouchet, etc. (F. mouchet, emouchet (ML. musculus, musculus) = It. moschetta, also with diff. suffix, moscarda), a kind of hawk, so called with ref. to spots on its breast, or more prob. from its small size, being compared to a fly, dim. < L. musca, a fly (> OF. mosche, F. mouche, a spot, a fly; see mouche). (F. musquito,) In falconry, an inferior kind of hawk; a sparrow-hawk. See eyas-musket.

One they might trust their common woe, to wreak;
The Musquet and the Cynstral were too weak.

Dryden, Wind and Panther, III. 1119.

muskett (mus'két), n. [Formerly also musquet; = D. musket = G. muskete = Sw. musket = Dan. musket, < OF. musquette, monquet (F. musquette), m., musquete, musquete, f., = Sp. Fg. musqueta (ML. moschetta, moschetta), < It. moschetto, a musket gun), so called (like other names of firearms, e. g. falcon, falconet, saker) from a hawk, < moschetto, a kind of hawk; see muskett.] A hand-gun for soldiers, introduced in European armies in the sixteenth century; it succeeded the harquebus, and became in time the common arm of the infantry. It was at first very heavy, and was provided with a rest. The earliest muskets were matchlocks, which were superseded by the wheel lock, the snap-hance, the flint lock, and the percussion guns. The musket was made lighter, while still gaining in efficiency and accuracy. The rifle musket was introduced in the middle of the nineteenth century. See rifle, and cut under matchlock and gun.

And is it I
That drive thee from the sportive court where thou Wast shot at with fair eyes, to be the mark
Of stinky musketry?
Shak, All's Well, III. 9. 111.

Bastard musket, a hand gun used in the sixteenth century. See cut under gun.

muskett-arrow (mus'két-á-ró), n. A short arrow thrown from a firearm. These arrows seem to have been generally feathered, but examples remain of arrows three or four inches long with barbed heads and a disk shaped butt, which appear to have been intended for this use. Rep. Royal Commission, 1880.

musketeer (mus'két-é-ér), n. [Formerly also musketter, musketer, musquetier; = D. G. musketeer = Sw. musketeer = Dan. musketeer, < F. musquetaire (= Sp. mosquetero = Pg. mosquetiro = It. moschettiere), a soldier armed with a musket. < musquete, a musket; see muskett.] 1. A soldier armed with a musket.

Raleigh, leaving his gally, took eight musketeers in his barge.
Oliver, vi. Walter Raleigh

mutillare (> It. mutillare = Sp. mutillar = F. mutiller), maim, < mutillus, maimed; cf. Gr. μυζος, μυζος, curtailed.] 1. To cut off a limb or any important part of; deprive of any characteristic member, feature, or appurtenance, so as to disfigure; maim: as, to mutillate a body or a statue; to mutillate a tree or a picture.

Gonzalvo was affected even to tears at beholding the mutilated remains of his young and gallant adversary.

Present, Ford, and Isa., II. 12.

Of the nine pillars of the upper verandah only two remain standing, and those much mutilated, while all the six of the lower storey have perished.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 141.

2. Figuratively, to excise, erase, or expunge any important part from, so as to render incomplete or imperfect, as a record or a poem.

As I have declared you before in my preface, I will not in any work willingly mangle or mutilate that honourable man's work.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 1291.

Among the mutilated poets of antiquity, there is none whose fragments are so beautiful as those of Sappho.

Addison.

Syn. 1. Mutillate, Maim, Cripple, Mangle, Disfigure. Mutillate emphasizes the injury to completeness and to beauty: as, to mutillate a statue. Maim and cripple note the injury to the use of the members of the body, mangle suggesting perhaps more of ineffectiveness, pain, and actual loss of members, and cripple more directly emphasizing the diminished power of action, as crippled in the left arm. Mangle expresses a badly hacked or torn condition: as, a mangled finger or arm. Disfigure covers simply such changes of the external form as injure its appearance or beauty: one may be fearfully mangled in battle, so as to be disfigured for life, and yet finally escape being mutillated or maimed, or even crippled. 2. Mutillate, Garble, Misquote. To mutillate is to take parts of a thing, so as to leave it imperfect or incomplete; to garble is to take parts of a thing in such a way as to make them convey a false impression; to misquote is to quote incorrectly, whether intentionally or not: as, to mutillate a hymn; to garble a passage from an official report; to payble another's words; to misquote a text of Scripture. Garble has completely lost its primary meaning.

mutillate (mūt'li-āt), a. and n. [= F. mutillat = Pg. mutillado = It. mutillato, < L. mutillatus, pp. of mutillare; see mutillare, v.] I. a. 1. Same as mutillated.

He caused him to be . . . shamefully mutillate.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, III. 4.

Shak., M. for M., II. x. 27.

mutuary (mū'tū-ē-ri), a. pl. mutuaries (-rēz). [= Pg. mutuario, a borrower, < LL. mutuarius, mutual, < L. mutuus, borrowed, mutual; see mutual.] In law, one who borrows personal chattels to be consumed by him in the use, and returned to the lender in kind.

mutuater (mū'tū-āt), v. t. [cut at L. mutuatus, pp. of mutare (= It. mutare = Pg. mutare), borrowed, < mutuus, borrowed; see mutual.] To borrow.

Which for to eat themselves and their band the more perpetually forward had mutuater and borrowed dyables and sordid summes of money.
Hall, Henry VII., act 7. (Rolls.)

mutuatiōn (mū'tū-ē-ōn), n. [= Pg. mutuatō = It. mutuatōne, < L. mutuatō (= mutuare, borrow, < mutuus, borrowed; see mutual.] The act of borrowing.

mutuatiōn (mū'tū-ē-tish'us), a. [cut at LL. mutuatiōn, borrowed, < L. mutuari, borrow; see mutuation.] Borrowed; taken from some other.

The mutuatiōn good works of their pretended holy men and women.

Dr. H. More, Antidote against Idolatry, x.

mutule (mū'tūl), n. [= F. mutule = It. mutulo, < L. mutulus, a mutule, modillon.] In arch., a projecting piece in the form of a flat block

1. Greek Mutules. 2. Roman Mutules.

under the corona of the Doric cornice, corresponding to the modillion of other orders. The mutules are placed one over every triglyph and metope, and bear on the under side guttae or drops, which represent the heads of pegs or treenails in the primitive wooden construction, to the rafter-ends of which the mutules correspond. See cut under gutta.

mutuum (mū'tū-um), n. [L., a loan; neut. of mutuus, borrowed; see mutual.] In Scots law, a contract by which such things are lent as are consumed in the use, or cannot be used without their extinction or alienation, such as corn, wine, money, etc.

muwett, a. A Middle English form of mutel. Chaucer.

muw (muks), v. t. [A var. of muw, confused with muw, muw.] To botch; make a mess of; spoil; often with an imitative it: as, he muwed it badly that time. [Colloq.]

By a sort of mismanagement on the part of my mother and Nicholas Snow, who had thoroughly muwed up everything.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, III.

muw (muks), n. [cut at muw, v.] Work performed in an awkward or improper manner; a botch; in a mess; as, he made a muw of it. [Colloq.]

muw (muks), n. [A var. of muw.] Dirt; filth; same as muw. [Prov. Eng.]

muw (muks), a. [cut at muw + -y.] Muddy; murky. Also muwky. [Prov. Eng.]

The ground . . . was . . . muddied and sodden, as we call it, muwky.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xlv.

Muzarab (mū-zar'ab), n. A variant of Mozarab.

Muzarabic (mū-zar'ā-bik), a. A variant of Mozarabic.

muzhik (mū-zhik'), n. [Russ. muzhik, a peasant.] A Russian peasant. Also written mujk, moujik.

There stood the patient bearded muzhik (peasant) in his well-worn sheep skin.
D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 408.

Muzio gambit. See gambit.

muw (muks), v. t. [Prob. a dial. var. of muw.] To muse idly; loiter foolishly.

If you but know, cried I, to whom I am going to-night, and who I shall see to-night, you would not dare keep me muzzling here.
Mass. D. Arday, Diary, I. 168. (Davies.)

muzzelthrush (muz'el-thrush), n. Same as mistlethrush. [Prov. Eng.]

muzziness (muz'el-ness), n. [cut at muzzy + -ness.] The state of being muzzy.

muzzle (mus'l), n. [Early mod. E. also musle, musle, mouse, musell, mozell; < MR. musel, < (OF. musel, mouseu, museau (F. muscas), orig. morsel* (> Bret. morszel, muzel) = Fr. morsel, mursel (ML. reflex musculus, musculus; cf. Gael. muscal, < E.), the snuzzle, snout, or nose of a beast, mouth, opening, aperture, dim. of OF. muse, mouze = Fr. muse = It. muso, muzzle, < L. muscus, a bite, ML. also the muzzle of a beast (ML. muscus, musus, after (OF.); see morsel, morsel.] 1. The projecting jaws and nose of an animal, as an ox or a dog; the snout.

It (the harkish) feedeth on the grass that groweth on the banks of the River, and never goeth out; it hath a mouth like the mouth of an Ox.

Purshon, Pilgrimage, p. 67.

His (William the Tasty's) nose turned up, and the corners of his mouth turned down, pretty much like the muzzle of an irritable pug-dog. Frederic, Knickerbocker, p. 240.

The creature held his muzzle on your leg.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

3. The mouth of a thing; the end for entrance or discharge: applied chiefly to the end of a tube, as the open end of a gun or pistol.—3. Anything which prevents an animal from biting, as a strap around the jaws, or a sort of cage, as of wire, into which the muzzle (def. 1) is inserted.

With golden muzzles all their mouths were bound.
Dryden, Fal. and Arc., III. 66.

Muzzle of Warhorse, forming part of the horse or defensive armor, 16th century.

4. In armor, an openwork covering for the nose, used for the defense of the horse, and forming part of the armor in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.—5. A piece of the forward end of the plow-beam by which the traces are attached: same as bridle, 5.—Muzzle-energy, the energy of a shot when it leaves the muzzle of a gun, expressed by the formula $\frac{22.16 \times 3200}{\text{foot-tons}}$ of energy, v representing the weight of shot in pounds and v the velocity in feet per second.—Muzzle-velocity, in guns, the velocity, in feet per second, of a projectile as it leaves the muzzle of a piece. See velocity.

muzzle (muz'l), v.: pret. and pp. muzzled, pp. muzzling. [Early mod. E. also muzzle, mouze, mouzele, mouzel, etc., < ME. musele, < OF. (and F.) moueler, < mouet, mouel, mouzele: see muzzle.] L. trans. 1. To bind or confine the mouth of in order to prevent biting or eating.

As Oyle began to speak,
Thou schalt muzzle helle chuke
And hell barre the hand schal breke
Holy Rood (V. E. T. 8), p. 213.

Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn.
Levit. xiv. 6.

My danger muzzled,
Least it should bite its master.
Shak., W. T. I. 2. 156.

2. Figuratively, to gag; silence.

How wretched is the fate of those who write!
Brought muzzled to the stage for fear they bite Dryden, Prod. to Fletcher's Plutarch.

The press was muzzled, and allowed to publish only the reports of the official gazette. Harper's Mag. LXXXV. 929.

3. To mask. Junison.

They danced along the Kirk yard, Gillie Duncan, playing on a trumpet, and John Fian, muzzled for the way.
Newes from Scotland (1601).

4. To fondle with the closed mouth; muzzle.
The nurse was then muzzling and cooing to the child.
Sir J. L. Edmonds.

5. To grub up with the snout, as swine do. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]—6. To handle or pull about.

He . . . so muzzled me. Wycherley, Country Wife, IV. 3.
Muzzle the pig, same as muzzle the pig.—Syn. Muff, etc. See gag, v.

II. intrans. 1. To bring the muzzle or mouth near.

The bear muzzles and smells to him. Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. To drink to excess; guzzle. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. To loiter; trifle; skulk. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]

muzzle-bag (muz'l-bag), n. Naut., a painted canvas cap fitted over the muzzle of a gun at sea, to keep out water.

muzzle-lashing (muz'l-lash'ing), n. Naut., a rope used to lash the muzzle of a gun to the upper part of a port when hoisted.

muzzle-loader (muz'l-ler), n. A gun which is loaded from the muzzle: opposed to breech-loader.

muzzle-loading (muz'l-lō'ding), a. Made to be loaded at the muzzle: said of a gun.

muzzle-right (muz'l-rit), n. A right placed on or near the muzzle of a gun; a front right.

muzzle-strap (muz'l-strap), n. A strap buckled over the mouth of a horse or other animal to prevent biting: it is a substitute for a muzzle.

muzzy (muz'i), a. [Appar. var. of musy, < muzzle + -y. Cf. muzz.] Dazed; stupid; tipsy.

Mr. L., a sensible man of eighty-two, . . . his wife a dull muzzy old creature.
New W. Arday, Diary, I. 26. (Darius)

Very muzzy with British principles and spirits.
Darius, My Novel, III. 21.

my (mi), pron. [< MD. mya, mine, myne, < AS. me, of me, as a poss., mine: the final a being lost as in a for an, thy for thine, etc., = mine.] Belonging to me: as, this is my book: always used attributively, mine being used for the predicative. Formerly mine was more usual before a noun, and my before a pronoun, but my now stands before both: as, my book; my own book; my eye.

Therefore may no man in that Countree sayn, This is my Wyf: no no Woman may sayn, This is mye Husbande.
Beveridge, Travels, p. 176.

I would sit in my tale (I call it mine, after the use of Iwerel) and think upon the war, and the hardness of those far-away battles.
R. L. Stevenson, Memoirs of an Idiot.

Mya (mi'), n. [NL., < L. mya for myax*, < (Gr. μύα, a sea-mussel), < μύα, a muscle, mussel, mouse; see mouze, mouzele.] A genus of bivalve shells to which very different limits have been assigned.

By Linnaeus numerous species belonging to different families were included in it. By later writers it was successively restricted: Retzius, in 1793, limited it to the Pinnae, but by subsequent authors was used for the Mya arenaria and related species, and as such it is universally adopted at the present time. M. arenaria is the common clam or cock of the coasts of the northern hemisphere. M. truncata is a second species, truncated behind.

Mya (mi'), n. [NL., more prop. Myia*, < (Gr. μύα, rarely μύα, a fly; see Musca.] A genus of flies.

mya, n. Plural of myon.

mya, n. See myon, myon.

Myacea, Myacina (mi-ā-sē-ā, -ā), n. pl. [NL. (Munk, 1830), < Mya + -acea, -acina.] 1. A family of bivalves: same as Myidae.—2. A superfamily or suborder of bivalves constituted for the families Myidae, Corbularia, Saxicardida, and related types.

Myadina (mi-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mya + -adina.] In conch., (a) In earlier systems, a group of bivalve shells, or siphonate lamellibranchiate mollusks, related to the cock or clam, Mya, including numerous genera, such as Tellina, Anatina, Lutraria, Pandora, etc., now separated into different families. (b) Same as Myida.

myalgia (mi-ā-ljā), n. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, muscle, + αλγία, pain.)] In pathol., a morbid state of a muscle, characterized by pain and tenderness. Its pathology is obscure. Also called myodinia and muscular rheumatism. Myalgia lumbalis, lumbago.

myalgic (mi-ā-lj'ik), a. [< myalgia + -ic.] Of or pertaining to myalgia; affected with myalgia. Quinn, Med. Diet., p. 1212.

myall, myall-tree (mi-āl-trē), n. One of several Australian acacias, affording a hard and useful scented wood. The Victorian myall is Acacia homophylla. It has a dark brown wood, sought for turners' work and used particularly for tobacco pipes. From its fruits . . . the wood is sometimes called red wood. Another myall is A. acuminata of western Australia, its wood is used in the raspberry, and making durable posts and excellent charcoal; others are A. pendula and A. glauca, the latter prettily grained but less fragrant.

Myaria (mi-ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see Mya.] A family of bivalves: same as Myidae in its more comprehensive sense. [Formerly in general use, but now abandoned.]

myarian (mi-ā-ri-ān), a. and n. [< Myaria + -an.] 1. a. Pertaining to or resembling a clam; of or pertaining to the Myaria.
2. n. A clam, or some similar bivalve.

myasthenia (mi-ās-thē-ni-ā), n. [< (Gr. μύα, muscle, + ασθένεια, weakness; see asthenia.] Muscular debility.

myasthenic (mi-ās-thē-n'ik), a. Affected with myasthenia.

mycchet, n. See mitch.

mycel (mi-sē'), n. [< NL. mycelium.] Same as mycelium.

mycelial (mi-sē-li-āl), a. [< mycelium + -al.] Of or pertaining to mycelium. Mycelial layer. Same as membranous mycelium. Mycelial strand. Same as fibrous mycelium.

mycelloid (mi-sē-li-oid), a. [< NL. mycelium + -oid.] In bot., resembling a mushroom.

mycelium (mi-sē-li-um), n. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + εἶδος, nail, wart, an excrescence on a plant.)] The vegetative part of the thallus of fungi, composed of one or more hyphae. The vegetative system of fungi consists of filiform branched or unbranched cells called hyphae, and the hyphae collectively form the mycelium. Also mycel. See cutis under Fungi, mold, mildew, yeast, and Leucostoma.

Fibrillose mycelium. Same as fibrous mycelium.—Fibrous mycelium, mycelium in which the hyphae form, by their union, elongated branching strands.—Filamentous mycelium, mycelium of free hyphae which are at most loosely interwoven with one another, but without forming bodies of definite shape and outline. In Fungi.—Floccose mycelium.

Same as filamentous mycelium.—Membranous mycelium. See membranous.

Mycoctales (mi-sē-tā'les), n. pl. [NL. (Berkeley, 1857), < Mycoctes.] A former division of cryptogamous plants, including fungi and lichens.

Mycoctes (mi-sē-tēs), n. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, a hollower, < μύα, hollow; cf. L. myctus, hollow: see myctus.] The typical and only genus of Mycoctales, established by Illiger in 1811; the howlers: a synonym of Alouatta of prior date. There are several species, as M. orcutti, inhabiting the forests of tropical America from Guatemala to Paraguay. See cut under howler.

Mycoctes (mi-sē-tēs), n. pl. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, a fungus, mushroom.)] The plants now called Fungi: a term proposed by Sprengel.

Mycoctina (mi-sē-ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Mycoctes + -ina.] A subfamily of Cebidae, represented by the genus Mycoctes; the howling monkeys, howlers, or alouatta. They are platyrrhine monkeys of tropical America, having the cerebrum so short that it leaves the cerebellum exposed behind, the incisors vertical, and the hyoid bone and larynx enormously developed, the former being expanded and excavated into a hollow drum, a conformation which gives extraordinary strength and resonance of voice. They are the largest of American monkeys, nearly 3 feet in length of head and body, including legs, with long prehensile tail and non-apposable thumb.

mycotogenic (mi-sē-tō-jē-nō't'ik), a. In bot., produced by fungi.

Phenomena of deformation by Fungi may be termed mycotogenic metamorphosis. In Fungi, Fungi (trans.), p. 266.

mycotogenous (mi-sē-tō-jē-nō's), a. [< (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + γενος, producing; see genous.] Same as mycotogenic.

mycotology (mi-sē-tō-lō-j'ē), n. [< (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + λογία, < λόγος, speak; see ology.] The science of fungi: same as mycology.

mycotoma (mi-sē-tō-mā), n. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + τομή, a cutting.)] 1. A chronic disease of the feet and hands occurring in Hindu-stani. The feet (or hands) become riddled with sinuses which discharge pale yellow masses of minute bodies resembling fish roe (pale or ochrole form of mycetozoa), or dark masses resembling gingivoid (dark or melanoid form). In the latter the fungus Chytridium has been found. The disease lasts for decades, and the only relief seems to be in the amputation of the affected member. Also called Madura foot, Madura disease, Fungus disease, and lancet-jaw of India.

2. [< (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + τομή, a cutting.)] In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

mycetophagid (mi-sē-tō-fā-j'ed), a. and n. 1. a. Of or relating to the Mycetophagidae.
2. n. One of the Mycetophagidae.

Mycetophagide (mi-sē-tō-fā-j'ed), n. pl. [NL., < Mycetophagus + -idae.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, typified by the genus Mycetophagus. They have the dorsal segments of the abdomen partly membranous, the ventral segments free, the last four jointed, the wings not fringed with hair, the anterior coxae oval and separated by the corneous prosternum, the head free, and the body depressed. The species live in fungi and under the bark of trees. The family is small, but of wide distribution, containing about 10 genera and less than 100 species. The beetles of this family are sometimes distinguished as lutei Fungus beetles from the Knopidae, in which case the latter are called small Fungus beetles.

mycetophagus (mi-sē-tō-fā-j'us), a. [< NL. Mycetophagus, < (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + φαγος, eat.)] Feeding on fungi; fungivorous.

Mycetophagus (mi-sē-tō-fā-j'us), n. [NL. (Hall-wig, 1792); see mycetophagidae.] The typical genus of Mycetophagidae. About 30 species are known, all feed on fungi; 17 inhabit North America, and the rest are found in temperate Europe.

Mycetophila (mi-sē-tō-fī-lā), n. [NL., < (Gr. μύα, a fungus, + φιλος, loving.)] 1. The typical genus of Mycetophilidae, founded by Meigen in 1803. The larvae live in fungi and decaying wood. The genus is large and wide spread, over 100 species are European, and 20 are described from North America. Also Mycetophila, Mycetophila.

2. A genus of tenebrionine beetles, erected by Gyllenhal in 1810, and comprising a number of European and North American species, 14 of which inhabit the United States. The genus is the same as Myopacharia of Latreille, 1825, and the latter name is commonly used Mycetophila being preoccupied in Isopoda.

Mycetophilidae (mi-sē-tō-fī-lā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mycetophila + -idae.] A family of nemocerous dipterous insects, typified by the genus Mycetophila; the agaric-gnats, fungus-gnats, or fungus-midges. There are many hundred species of small or minute size, active and catantorial, having four veined wings with discal cell, long erect, spined filum, and usually a cell. The larvae are long slender grubs, like worms and feed on fungi, whence the name. Also Mycetophilidae, Mycetophilidae, Mycetophilidae.

Mycetozoa (mi-sē-tō-zō-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of mycetozoon.] A group of fungus-like organisms.

amounting at the present time to nearly 300 species. The larger number of them are contained in the division Mycetozoa or slime fungi, together with the smaller one distinguished by Van Tieghem under the name of Acridos. (See fungi.) Their nutrition is saprophytic, and the organism of reproduction is sufficiently like those of fungi to allow the same terminology to be applied to them. The vegetative body, however, differs widely, being a naked protoplasmic mass. See Myxomycetes.

mycetozoon (mi-se-to-zō-on), n. [NL., < Gr. mykē (mykē), a fungus, + zōon, animal.] Any member of the Mycetozoa.

The naked protoplasm of the Mycetozoa is plasmodium. (See fungi, XIX, 322.)

mycoderm (mi-kō-dēr-in), n. [< Mycoderma, q. v.] A fungus of the genus Mycoderma.

Mycoderma (mi-kō-dēr-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. mykē, a fungus, + derma, skin; see derma.] A genus or form-genus under which certain of the fermentation-fungi are known. See fermentation, and mother 2, 2.

mycodermatoid (mi-kō-dēr-mā-toid), a. [< Mycoderma (q. v.) + -oid.] Same as mycodermic.

mycodermic (mi-kō-dēr-mik), a. [< Mycoderma + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the genus Mycoderma.

mycodermitis (mi-kō-dēr-mī-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. mykē, fungus, + derma, skin, + -itis.] Inflammation of a mucous membrane.

mycologic (mi-kō-lō-jik), a. [< mycology + -ic.] Same as mycological.

mycological (mi-kō-lō-jik-al), a. [< mycology + -al.] Relating to mycology, or to the fungi.

mycologically (mi-kō-lō-jik-al-ly), adv. In a mycological manner; from a mycological point of view.

mycologist (mi-kō-lō-jist), n. [< mycology + -ist.] One who is versed in mycology.

mycology (mi-kō-lō-jī), n. [= F. mycologie; < Gr. mykē, a fungus, + -logia, < lōgos, speak; see -ology.] The science of fungi, their structure, affinities, classification, etc. Also called fungology and mycetology.

mycophagist (mi-kō-fā-jist), n. [< mycophagy + -ist.] One who eats fungi.

mycophagy (mi-kō-fā-jī), n. [< Gr. mykē, a fungus, + -phagē, < phagō, eat.] The eating of fungi.

The divine art of mycophagy reached a good degree of cultivation. (Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV, 406.)

mycoprotein (mi-kō-prō-tē-in), n. [< Gr. mykē, a fungus, + F. protéine.] A gelatinous albuminoid compound closely allied to protoplasm, of which the putrefaction-bacteria are composed.

The bacteria consist of a nitrogenous, highly refractive, usually colorless substance, protoplasm or mycoprotein, imbedded in which glittering, oily-looking granules can sometimes be observed. (W. T. Henshaw, Relations of Micro-Organisms to Disease, p. 5.)

Myorrhiza (mi-kō-rī-zā), n. [< Gr. mykē, a fungus, + rhiza, root.] A fungus-mycelium which invests the roots of certain phenogams, especially Euphorbia and some other forest-trees. It is believed to add them in absorbing nutriment from the soil. A case of symbiosis. See symbiosis.

mycose (mi-kō-sē), n. [< Gr. mykē, a fungus, + -ose.] A peculiar kind of sugar (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁ + 2H₂O) contained in the ergot of rye, and also in trehalis manna, produced by a species of insect (Larinus) found in the East. It is soluble in water, does not reduce copper-solutions, and is converted by acids into a fermentable sugar. Also called trehalose.

mycosis (mi-kō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. mykē, a fungus, + -osis.] 1. The presence of fungi as parasites in or on any portion of the body. — 2. The presence of parasite fungi together with the morbid effects of their presence; the disease caused by them.

mycotic (mi-kō-tik), a. [< mycosis (q. v.) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mycosis. (Lancet.)

Mycteria (mik-tēr-ī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. mykē, nose, snout, < mykō (in comp.), blow the nose; cf. L. mygere, blow the nose; see myc-.] A genus of storks, of the family Ciconiidae and the subfamily Ciconiinae, having the head and neck mostly bare of feathers, and the bill enormously large and recurved. M. americana is the jabiru. Certain Old World storks are sometimes included in Mycteria, sometimes called Trochilopterus and Epipodiceps. See cuts under jabiru.

mydaleine (mi-dā-lē-in), n. [< Gr. mydalos, wet, dripping, < myda, damp or wet; see Mydus.] A poisonous plasmine obtained from putrefying liver and other organs.

Mydas, n. See Mydas.

Mydalide (mi-dā-lī-dē), n. pl. Same as Mydus 2.

Mydaus (mid-ā-us), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. mydāos, be lamp or wet, < mydōs, damp, wet, clamminess, decay.] A genus of feline badgers, of the family Mustelidae and subfamily Melinae, including the stinking badger of Java, or Javanese skunk, M. javanensis or M. meliceps. See teddy.

mydding, n. An obsolete spelling of midding.

mydget, n. An obsolete spelling of midge.

mydriasis (mi-dri-ā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. mydriasis, undue enlargement of the pupil of the eye.] In med., a morbid dilatation of the pupil of the eye.

mydriatic (mi-dri-ā-tik), n. and a. [< mydriasis + -ic.] 1. a. Pertaining to or causing mydriasis. 2. n. A drug which causes mydriasis.

myelasthenia (mi-el-as-tē-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + asthēnia, weakness; see asthenia.] In pathol., spinal exhaustion; spinal neurasthenia.

myelatrophy (mi-el-ā-trof-ī), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + atrophy, atrophy; see atrophy.] In pathol., atrophy of the spinal cord.

Myelencephala (mi-el-ēn-sē-fā-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of myelencephalus; see myelencephalus.] In Owen's classification, same as vertebrata. [Not in use.]

myelencephalic (mi-el-ēn-sē-fā-līk), a. [< myelencephalus + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the cerebrospinal axis; cerebrospinal. — 2. Of or pertaining to the medulla oblongata. See myelencephalon. — 3. Same as myelencephalon.

myelencephalon (mi-el-ēn-sē-fā-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + encephalon, brain; see encephalon.] 1. The cerebrospinal axis; the brain and spinal cord taken together and considered as a whole. Owen. — 2. The hindmost segment of the encephalon; the afterbrain or metencephalon, more commonly called the medulla oblongata. See cuts under encephalon and brain. Huxley.

myelencephalous (mi-el-ēn-sē-fā-lus), a. [< NL. myelencephalus, < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + encephalos, brain; see encephalon.] Having a brain and spinal cord; cerebrospinal. Also myelencephalic.

myelin, myeline (mi-el-īn), n. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -in, < -ia.] In anat., the white substance of Schwann, or medullary sheath of a nerve.

myelitic (mi-el-ī-tik), a. [< myelitis + -ic.] Of or pertaining to myelitis; affected with myelitis.

myelitis (mi-el-ī-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the spinal cord. — Anterior cornual myelitis. See cornual.

myelocoele (mi-el-lō-sē-lē), n. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -cēle, tumor.] A variety of spina bifida.

myelocerebellar (mi-el-lō-sē-lē-bel-ār), a. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + L. cerbellum, cerebellum; see cerebellar.] Pertaining to the cerebellum and the spinal cord; as, the myelocerebellar tract.

myelocoele (mi-el-lō-sē-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -cēle, hollow.] The entire cavity of the myelon or spinal cord, consisting primitively of a syringocoele with a posterior dilatation termed rhombocoele. See cut under spinal.

myelocyte (mi-el-lō-sē-lē), n. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -cyte, cell.] Same as myocyte. (Nature, XLII, 72.)

myelophphos (mi-el-ē-lō-fā), n. pl. [NL., prop. myelophphos, < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + phos, web; see lypha.] The hyphae of lichens, which are rigid, elastic, containing leucoderm, not becoming putrid by maceration, with no faculty of penetrating or involution, while the hyphae of fungi are caducous, soft, flexible, with thin walls, etc.

myeloid (mi-el-lō-id), a. [= F. myeloide, < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -oid, like marrow, < myelōs, marrow, + -oid, form.] Medullary.

myeloma (mi-el-lō-mā), n. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -oma.] A giant-celled sarcoma.

myelomalacia (mi-el-lō-mā-lā-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + malacia, softness; see malacia.] In pathol., softening of the spinal cord.

myelomeningitis (mi-el-lō-men-in-jī-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + NL. meningitis, q. v.] In pathol., spinal meningitis.

myelon (mi-el-lōn), n. [NL., < Gr. myelōs, neut. earlier myelōs, m., marrow.] The spinal cord; the part of the cerebrospinal axis which is not the brain. See cuts under spine, spinal, and Pharyngobrachia.

myelomal (mi-el-lō-mal), a. [< myeloma + -al.] Of or pertaining to the myeloma.

myelonic (mi-el-lō-nik), a. [< myeloma + -ic.] Same as myelomal. (Encyc. Brit., XVI, 680.)

myeloplax (mi-el-lō-plaks), n. [< Gr. myelōs, marrow, + -plax, anything flat and broad.] A large multinucleated protoplasmic mass, occurring in the marrow, especially in the neighborhood of the osseous substance. These masses, also called osteoclasts or plasma cells, are concerned in the process of bone-absorption.

Myelozoa (mi-el-lō-zō-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Geoffroy St. Hilaire, 1852), < Gr. myelōs, marrow, + zōon, an animal.] A class of vertebrate animals with a spinal cord or myelon, but no brain or skull. They are the acranial or accephalous vertebrates, represented by the lancelet or amphioxus. See cuts under larvæ.

myelozoan (mi-el-lō-zō-an), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Myelozoa. 2. n. A member of the Myelozoa.

Mygale (mig-ā-lē), n. [NL., < F. mygale, < L. mygale, < Gr. mygale, mygale, mygale, field-mouse, < myg, mouse, + -ale, yalē, a weasel.] 1. A Cuvierian genus of insectivorous quadrupeds, the deerman; later changed to Myogale or Myogalina. (Cuvier, 1850.) — 2. The leading genus formerly of the now-disused family Mygalidae. This genus included the very largest and hairiest spiders in the United States known as tarantulas, a name which in Europe belongs to quite a different kind. The common tarantula of the southwestern United States was called M. hesperia, a hairy brown species of large size and much dreaded. M. arizonensis is a former name of the South American bird spider, able to prey upon small birds, but under this designation several large hairy spiders have been confounded. It is now placed in the genus Eurypelma. M. javanica and M. sumatrana inhabit the countries whence their names are derived. They inhabit tubular holes in the ground under stones, or beneath the bark of trees. The bite is very painful and even dangerous. See cuts under Araneida, Arachnida, and Chelicerata. (Latreille, 1802.)

FIG. 1. Tarantula, Mygalidae, with natural size.

Mygalide (mi-gal-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mygale + -idae.] A former family of spiders, typified by the genus Mygale. It included the largest known spiders, with four pulmonary sacs, eight eyes clustered together, and great mandibles which work up and down. Mygale, Cteniza, and Atypus were leading genera. The American tarantulas, the trap-door spiders, and others belonged to this family. Synonymous with Theraphosidae. See Terrapinnaria.

Mygalina (mig-ā-lī-nā), n. pl. Same as Mygalidae.

myght, myghtet. Obsolete spellings of might, might.

myghty, a. An obsolete spelling of mighty.

mygraret, mygreyret, n. Middle English forms of migraine, for migrain.

Myiadestes (mi-ī-ā-des-tēs), n. [NL., improp. for Myiades, < Gr. myia, a fly, + ides, an eater, < idō = L. edere = F. eat.] The leading genus of Myiadestinae, containing most of the species. M. tenebris inhabits the western part of the United States. It is of a dull brownish ash color, paler below, the wings blackish with tawny variegations, the tail blackish, some of the feathers tipped with white, the bill and feet black, the eye surrounded with a white ring. The bird is 4 inches long, the wing and tail each about 4. It is an equatorial songster, and nests on the ground or near it, building a loose nest of grasses, and laying about four eggs of a bluish-white color with reddish freckles, 0.95 of an inch long by 0.67 broad. Several other species inhabit the warmer parts of America.

Myiadestina (mi-ī-ā-des-tē-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Myiadestes + -ina.] An American subfamily of oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Myiadestes, usually referred to the Turdidae, but also placed in the Amphispidae; the fly-catching thrushes. The bill is short, much depressed, wide at base, and deeply cleft. The feet are small, with broad tarsal and deeply cleft toes, of which the lateral ones are of unequal length. There are ten primaries, the first spurious, and to eleven narrow tapering rectrices; the tail is double-rouned; the head is abbreviated; the plumage is slender, spotted in the young; the sexes are alike. There are about 12 species, belonging to the genera Myiadestes, Chondestes, and Phalaropus, all but one of them inhabiting central America, South America, and the West Indies. They are frugivorous and insectivorous, and highly musical.

myiadestine (mi-ī-ā-des-tē-nē), a. Pertaining to the Myiadestinae, or having their characters.

Myiagra (mi-ī-ā-grā), n. [NL., < Gr. myia, a fly, + -agra, hunting (taking).] The typical genus of Myiagrinae, founded by Vigors and Horsfield in 1826. It contains some 30 species of small flycatchers with very broad tail bills and copious retinal vibration, inhabiting the Australasian and Oceanian regions. M. rubicola is a characteristic example.

Myiagrinae (mi'i-ā-grī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Myiagrus + -inae.] A subfamily of Myiagropidae, typified by the genus Myiagrus, named by Cabanis in 1850.

Myiarchus (mi-i-ār-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μυια, a fly, + αρχης, a leader, chief, commander.] A notable genus of tyrant flycatchers of the family Tyrannidae. It is atypically of oliveous coloration with yellow belly and dusky wings and tail, both varied with rufous tints, and no colored patch on the crown, which is slightly crested. There are numerous species, inhabiting America from Canada to Paraguay, known as ash throated or rufous tailed flycatchers. The best known is the common great crested flycatcher of the United States, M. cinerascens, which is abundant in woodlands. It is of quarrelsome disposition, has a loud harsh voice, and habitually uses snake-skins in its nest. M. cinerascens is a similar species of the southern parts of the United States. M. lawrencei is a much smaller species of Texas and Mexico. M. cinerascens inhabits the West Indies, and there are many others in sub-tropical and tropical America.

Myiidae (mi'i-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Myia + -idae.] A family of dimorphic hivalves, typified by the genus Myia, to which various limits have been assigned. At most restricted, it comprises those which have the mantle open in front only for the foot and extended backward into a sheath covered by a rugous epidermis for the siphons, which are elongate and united to near their ends, the foot small and linguiform; the two pairs of branches elongated, but not extended into the branchial siphon; the shell inequivalve, having submedian umbones, gaping at the ends, its left or smallest valve provided with a flattened cartilage process; and the palial sinus deeply excavated. It is a group of generally large bivalves, some of which are of considerable commercial value. They are known as clams, gaping clams, and gapers. Also Myiidae, Myiacea.

Myioidoctes (mi'i-o-i-dē-ōk'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. μυια, a fly, + δοκτηρ, a pursuer; see Doctus.] A genus of fly-catching warblers of the family Syl- ricolidae and the subfamily Setophaginae, founded by Audubon in 1839. These species are well known and abundant birds of the United States. These are the hooded warbler, M. virens, the Canadian, M. canadensis, and Wilson's black-capped, M. pusillus.

Wilson's Black-capped Flycatching Warbler (Myioidoctes pusillus)

myitis (mi'i'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μυς, a muscle, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of a muscle. Also, improperly, myositis.

myl, n. An obsolete spelling of myll.

Mylabris (mi-lab'ri-lēs), n. pl. [NL., (Lacch., 1817), < Mylabris + -idae.] A family of blister-beetles named from the genus Mylabris, now usually merged in Cantharidae.

Mylabris (mi-lab'ri-lēs), n. [NL., (Fabricius, 1775), < Gr. μυλαβρις, also μυλαβρις and μυλαβρις, a kind of cockroach in mills and bake-houses, cf. μυλαβρις, a mill-stone, < μυλος, a mill.] A genus of blister-beetles of the family Cantharidae, or the type of a family Mylabridae. There are several species possessing vesicatory properties, and used as cantharides, such as M. cicindra and M. indica. The genus is of great extent, with over 250 species, almost confined to the Old World, and distributed through Europe, Asia, and Africa. M. cicindra and M. duculata are the only geographical exceptions, and there is some doubt about their position. The elytra cover the abdomen; the mandibles are short, and the antennae, inserted above the epimeral suture, are gradually enlarged toward the tip. These beetles are often of large size, and the coloration is yellow bands or spots on a black ground, or vice versa. They fly in the bright sunlight and frequent low ground.

mylar, n. A Middle English form of myl.

Myliobatidae (mi'i-bat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Myliobatus + -idae.] A family of ray-like sciaenians, typified by the genus Myliobatis; the eagle-rays or whip-rays. (a) A family of marine rays with a very broad disk formed by the expanded pectoral fins, cephalic fins developed at the end of the snout, and interlocking hexagonal teeth, set like a pavement in the jaw. About 50 species are known, chiefly from tropical seas. Their broad pectoral, ventral-like wings give them the name eagle-ray, and from the whip-like tail armed with a spine near the base they are called whip-rays and sting-rays, but they are not to be confounded with true sting-rays of the family Tyrannidae. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Batoidei, containing Myliobatis (a) and Cephaloscyllium.

myliobatine (mi-i-ob'ā-tin), n. Pertaining to the Myliobatidae, or having their characters.

Myliobatis (mi-i-ob'ā-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μυλος (see Mylos), a stone, a millstone, < μυλος, mill, millstone; see myll, + -atis, a flat fish, the skate.] The typical genus of Myliobatidae, with tessellated teeth adapted for grinding, whence the name. M. aquila is an example. See cut under eagle-ray.

myliobatoid (mi-i-ob'ā-toid), n. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Myliobatidae, or having their characters.

myll, n. One of the Myliobatidae.

myller, n. An obsolete spelling of myll.

myliner, n. An obsolete form of mylin.

Myiodon (mi'i-dōn), n. [NL., < Gr. μυιοδον (see Myios), a molar tooth, a grinder, < Gr. μυς, a mill, + δον (see Don) = E. tooth.] 1. A genus of gigantic extinct sloths from the Pleistocene, Skeleton of Myiodon.

having teeth more or less cylindrical and in structure resembling those of the extinct sloth. M. robustus is a well-known species from South America. The animal was large enough to browse on the foliage of trees.

2. [E.] An animal of this genus.

mylodont (mi'lō-dont), n. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the mylodons, or having their characters.

mylodon, n. A mylodon.

myloglossus (mi-lō-glos'sus), n. [E. myloglossus (1).] [NL., < Gr. μυλος, a mill, a molar tooth, a grinder, + γlossa, the tongue.] A muscular slip accessory to the styloglossus, passing from the angle of the jaw or the stylomaxillary ligament to the tongue.

mylohyoid (mi-lō-hi'oid), n. and n. I. a. [E. mylohyoid, a mill, a molar tooth, + E. hyoid.] 1. a. Pertaining to the molar teeth and to the hyoid bone.

Mylohyoid artery, a branch of the inferior dental which runs in the mylohyoid groove and ramifies under the mylohyoid muscle. Mylohyoid groove and ridge, a groove and a ridge along the inner surface of the lower jaw bone in the course of the mylohyoid vessels and nerve. Mylohyoid muscle, the mylohyoid. See cut under muscle. Mylohyoid nerve, a branch of the inferior dental accompanying the artery of the same name to the mylohyoid muscle and the anterior belly of the digastric.

2. n. The mylohyoidens, or the mylohyoid muscle, which extends between the mylohyoid ridge on the under jaw-bone and the hyoid bone, forming much of the muscular floor of the mouth.

mylohyoiden (mi'lō-hi-oid'ēn), n. Same as mylohyoid.

mylohyoidens (mi'lō-hi-oid'ēns), n. pl. mylohyoides (3). [NL.; see mylohyoid.] The mylohyoid muscle.

Myrmica (mi'mē-ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μυρμικα, a dial form of μυρμικα, for μυρμικα, blaine, Monmon; see Myrmica.] The typical genus of Myrmicinae. They have the first four jointed, the antennae distinctly petiolate, and the anterior wings widened only at the tip. Two species are known, both European. Formica (see Formica).

Myrmecodia (mi'mē-ri-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Myrmica + -odia.] The Myrmecodia rated as a family. Hol. lat., 1840. Also, Myrmecodia, Myrmecodia.

Myrmecinae (mi'mē-ri-ā-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Myrmica + -inae.] A subfamily of the hymenopterous family Proctotrupidae, containing some of the smallest insects known. The front tibiae have but one spur, the mandibles are dentate, the anterior tibiae show the middle of the face, and the very delicate hind wings are almost linear. These insects are all parasitic, many of them on bark lice. One of the smallest, Alaypus curvus, measures 0.17 millimeter in length.

myrmarine (mi'mē-ri-nē), n. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Myrmecinae, or having their characters.

2. n. A member of the Myrmecinae.

myr, pron. A Middle English form of myr, myr.

myra, myrah, n. See myr.

myrchen, n. See myrchen.

mychery, n. See mychery.

mynde, n. An obsolete spelling of mynd.

myndet, n. An obsolete form of mynd, mynd.

myng, n. An obsolete form of myng, myng.

myrbeer (mi'n-bar'), n. [E. myr beer (see G. myr beer), myr beer, myr beer.] myr beer, myr beer.

1. The ordinary title of address among Dutchmen, corresponding to mein Herr among Germans, and to Mr. or Mr. in English use. Hence — 2. A Dutchman. [Colloq.] myrnet, n. A Middle English form of myr.

myodynamics (mi'ô-dî-nam'îks), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + E. dynamics.] The mechanics of muscular action.

myodynamometer (mi-ô-dî-ng-mom'ô-tér), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + E. dynamometer.] An instrument for measuring muscular strength; a dynamometer.

myodynia (mi-ô-dî-nî-â), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + ðûn, pain.] Same as myalgia.

myofibroma (mi'ô-fî-brô'mî), n.; pl. myofibromata (-mî-tâ). [NL., < myo(ma) + fibroma.] A tumor in part myomatous and in part fibromatous.

Myogale (mi-ô-gâ-lê), n. [NL., < Gr. myogalê, a shrew-mouse, < mûc, a mouse, + galê, contr. galê, a weasel. Cf. Mygale.] The typical genus of the subfamily Myogalinae, containing the aquatic dormice, musk-moles, musk-shrews, or muskrats of the Old World, M. moschata of Russia and M. pyrenaica of the Pyrenees. The former is the giant of the Talpidae, some 16 inches long, with a proboscis, webbed feet, and a long scaly tail vertically flat, like that of a muskrat, and used similarly in swimming. In the smaller species the tail is round, and the proboscis still longer. The dental formula of both is 2 incisors, 1 canine, 4 premolars, and 3 molars in each upper and lower half jaw. Also Mygale and Myogalea. See under dormice.

Myogalidae (mi-ô-gâl'î-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Myogale + -idae.] The Myogalinae rated as a family of Insectivora. See Myogale, Myogalinae.

Myogalinae (mi'ô-gâl'î-nê), n. pl. [NL., < Myogale + -inae.] A subfamily of insectivorous mammals of the family Talpidae. There is no necessary carpal ossicle, the clavicle and humerus are moderately long, the manubrium sternal is moderate, and the scapula has a metasternon, the fore limbs being thus fitted for simple progression, not specially fossorial. The incisors are fewer than in any other Talpidae, being 2 in each upper and lower half jaw, or 2 in each upper and 1 in each lower half jaw. The group contains the genera (or subgenera) Myogale, Galopalar, Scaptoz, Proptala, Protrichus, and Neotrachis, all but the last confined to the Old World. They are known as dormice, musk-moles, and musk-shrews. Galopalar is a synonym. Also Mygalinae.

myogaline (mi-ô-gâl'î-n), a. Pertaining to the Myogalinae, or having their characters.

myogenic (mi-ô-jen'îk), a. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, origin.] Of muscular origin.

myoglobulin (mi-ô-glob'û-lîn), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + E. globulin.] A globulin obtained from muscle. It coagulates at a lower temperature than paraglobulin.

myogram (mi'ô-grâm), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, a writing, a line; see gram².] The tracing of a contracting and relaxing muscle drawn by a myograph.

myograph (mi'ô-grâf), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, write.] An instrument for taking tracings of muscular contractions and relaxations.

myographer (mi-ô-grâ-fér), n. [Gr. myograph + -er.] One who describes muscles or is versed in myography.

myographic (mi-ô-grâf'îk), a. [= F. myographique = Fr. myographique = It. miografico; as myography + -ic.] 1. Descriptive of muscles; pertaining to myography. — 2. Obtained with a myograph; as, a myographic tracing.

myographical (mi-ô-grâf'î-kal), a. [Gr. myographic + -al.] Same as myographic.

myographically (mi-ô-grâf'î-kal'î), adv. By means of the myograph.

myographion (mi-ô-grâf'î-on), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, write.] A myograph.

myographist (mi-ô-grâ-fîst), n. [Gr. myograph + -ist.] A myographer.

myography (mi-ô-grâ-fî), n. [= F. myographie = Sp. miografía = Fr. myographie = It. miografia; < Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, write.] Descriptive myology; the description of muscles.

myohematin (mi-ô-hem'a-tîn), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + E. hematin.] The specific pigment of muscle. Also myohematin.

myoid (mi'ôid), a. [Gr. myôidês, contr. myôidês (cf. Myoides), like a mouse (taken in sense of 'like a muscle'), < mûc, a mouse, muscle, + idês, form.] Resembling muscle.

myoidema (mi-ôidê-mâ), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + idêma, a swelling, oïdês, swell.] The wheal brought out by a smart tap on a muscle in certain conditions of exhaustion.

myolemma (mi-ô-lêm'â), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + lêmma, peel, < lêpsis, peel; see lepis.] Nucleolemma.

myologic (mi-ô-lôj'îk), a. [= Fr. myologique = It. miologica; as myology + -ic.] Same as myological.

myological (mi-ô-lôj'î-kal), a. [Gr. myologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to myology. — Myological formula, in crith, a formulated statement of the presence or absence of certain muscles of the legs of birds, for classificatory purposes, invented by A. H. Garrod, who used the symbols A, B, X, and Y to denote the ambiceps, semitendinosus, accessory semitendinosus, and semispinosus respectively; thus, a bird with the myological formula A, B, X, has the first three of these muscles and lacks the last.

myologist (mi-ô-lôj'îst), n. [Gr. myolog + -ist.] One who is versed in myology; a myological anatomist.

myology (mi-ô-lôj'î), n. [= F. myologie = Sp. miología = Fr. myologie = It. miologia; < Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, speak; see -ology.] The science of muscles; myological anatomy.

To instance in all the particulars were to write a whole system of myology. G. Chayne, Phil. Prin. of Natural Religion.

myoma (mi-ô-mâ), n.; pl. myomata (-mâ-tâ). [NL., < Gr. mûc, a muscle, + oma.] A neoplasm or tumor composed of muscular tissue. — Myoma cavernosum, myoma telangiectodes. Myoma leiocellulare, a myoma composed of smooth muscular fiber. Also called leiomyoma. Myoma striocellulare, a myoma composed of striated muscular tissue. Also called rhabdomyoma. Myoma telangiectodes, excessively vascular myoma.

myomalacia (mi'ô-mâ-lâ-sî-â), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + málacia, softness; see malacia.] Morbid softening of a muscle such as might be induced by an embolus of the nutrient artery. — Myomalacia cordis, softening of the myocardium from obstruction of the coronary arteries.

myomancy (mi'ô-man-sî), n. [Gr. mûc, mouse, + mântis, divination, < pântis, prophet; see Mantia.] A kind of divination or method of foretelling future events by the movements of mice.

Some authors hold myomancy to be one of the most ancient kinds of divination, and think it is on this account that Isaiah (lxi) reckons mice among the abominable things of the idolater. Isa. lxi.

myomantic (mi-ô-man'tîk), a. [As myomancy (-mânt-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to myomancy.

myomata, n. Plural of myoma.

myomatous (mi-ô-mâ-tûs), a. [Gr. myoma(-t-) + -ous.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with a myoma.

myomectomy (mi-ô-mek'tô-mî), n. [NL. myoma + Gr. êctomê, a cutting out.] Removal of a uterine myoma by abdominal section.

myomere (mi'ô-mêr), n. [Gr. mûc, a muscle, + yênc, a part.] A muscular metamere; a myocoma or myotome.

The rudimentary myotomes or myomeres of the tail. Encyc. Brit. XXIV. 186.

myomorph (mi'ô-môrf), n. A member of the Myomorpha, a murine rodent.

Myomorpha (mi-ô-môrf'â), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. mûc, a mouse, + yênc, form.] A superfamily of simiplitdentate rodents; one of three prime divisions of Glires simiplitdentati, containing the murine rodents, the others being Hystri-comorpha and Sciuromorpha. They have no post-orbital processes, slender zygomatic arches, the angular part of the mandible springing from the lower edge of the incisor socket (except in Rhithymorpha), perfect clavicles (except in Lophiomorpha), and the tibia and fibula ankylosed to some extent. Myomorpha include 9 families. Myiuridae, dormice; Lophiomorpha, shillings; Muridae, mice and rats, etc.; Synanthidae, mole rats; Geomysidae, gophers; Sciuridae, pocket rats and mice; Theridomysidae (fossil), Ipomysidae, jerboas, and Zapusidae, jumping deer-mice. See under mole rat, Muridae, Geomysidae, and deer-mice.

myomorphie (mi-ô-môrf'îk), a. [Gr. Myomorpha + -ic.] Murine in form or structure; pertaining to the Myomorpha, or having their characters.

myotomy (mi-ô-mot'ô-mî), n. [NL. myoma + Gr. yênc, a cutting.] Removal of a uterine myoma by abdominal section; myomectomy.

myon (mi'ôn), n.; pl. mya (-î). [NL., < Gr. mûc, a cluster of muscles, < mûc, a muscle; see muscle.] Any individual unit of musculature; a muscular integer. Cornes, The Auk, V. 104.

myonicity (mi-ô-nî-sî-tî), n. [Gr. myonic (< Gr. mûc, a muscular part of the body) (see myon) + -ity.] The characteristic property of living muscle, namely its power of contracting.

myonosis (mi-ôn'ô-sîs), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + yênc, disease.] In pathol., a disease of the muscles.

myopalpus (mi-ô-pal'mus), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + palpus, a vibration, quivering, < palêw, poise, vibrate, quiver.] A twitching of the muscles; subultus tendinum.

myopathic (mi-ô-pâ-thîk), a. [Gr. myopathy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to myopathy.

myopathy (mi-ô-pâ-thî), n. [NL. myopathia, < Gr. mûc, muscle, + pathê, < pathô, disease.] Disease of a muscle.

myope (mi'ôp), n. [= F. myope = Sp. miope = Fr. myope = It. miope; < NL. myopia (myop-), < Gr. mûc, short-sighted, lit. 'closing the myophore (mi'ô-fôr), n. [NL. myophorus; see myophorous.] A part or an apparatus of the shell of a mollusk specialized for the attachment of a muscle, as in the genus Eggnus.

myophorous (mi-ô-fô-rus), a. [NL. myophorus, < Gr. mûc, muscle, + phôros, < phêre = E. bear.] Bearing or connected with a muscle, as a myophore; provided with a myophore, as a mollusk.

myophysical (mi-ô-fîz'î-kal), a. [Gr. myophysic + -al.] Pertaining to myophysics.

myophysics (mi-ô-fîz'îks), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + phîsîs, physics; see phîsîc and phîsîcs.] The physics of muscle.

Such outstanding questions of myophysics as the pre-existence of muscular currents, the presence of a piezoelectric layer, the number and nature of cross-disks, etc. G. N. Hall, German Culture, p. 221.

myopia (mi-ô-pî-â), n. [NL., < L.L. myopia, < Gr. myopia, also myriasis (Galen), < mûc, short-sighted; see myope.] Short-sightedness; near-sightedness; the opposite of hypermetropia. In this condition, parallel rays of light are brought to a focus before they reach the retina, the accommodation being relaxed; the near-point and far point of distinct vision approach the eye. Also called brachymetropia.

myopic (mi-ô-pîk), a. [Gr. myop + -ic.] In pathol., of or relating to myopia; affected with myopia; short-sighted; near-sighted. Also brachymetropic.

myopolar (mi-ô-pô-lâr), a. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + pôlos, pole; see pole, polar.] Pertaining to the poles of muscular action, or to muscular polarity.

Correcting for the movement of the indifference point along the myopolar tract. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 185.

Myoporaceae (mi-ô-pô-râ-sê-â), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1835), < Gr. mûc, close, + poros, pore (see poro²), + -aceae.] Same as Myoporineae.

Myoporineae (mi-ô-pô-rîn'î-â), n. pl. [NL. (R. Brown, 1810), < Myoporum + -inae.] A order of dicotyledonous gamopetalous shrubs of the cohort Lamiales, typified by the genus Myoporum. It is distinguished by a two-lobed or oblique corolla, didynamous stamens, a two- or four-celled ovary with one or two seeds in each cell, drupaceous fruit, axillary flowers, and usually alternate leaves. There are 7 genera and about 80 species known, mainly Australian.

myoporineous (mi-ô-pô-rîn'î-us), a. Belonging to, resembling, or pertaining to the Myoporineae.

Myoporum (mi-ô-pô-rûm), n. [NL. (Banks and Solander, 1797), so called in allusion to the spots covering the leaves, which suggest pores closed with a semi-transparent substance; < Gr. mûc, close, + poros, a pore.] A genus of plants, type of the order Myoporineae, characterized by somewhat bell-shaped flowers and ovary-cells one-ovuled. About 20 species are known, ranging from Australia to Japan. They are smooth or glutinous shrubs or low trees bearing small white flowers. Introduced to some extent into greenhouses. M. laetum of New Zealand, named cutlerwood, is useful for shingle, and its wood takes a fine polish. M. sandwicense of the Sandwich Islands, etc., affords a fragrant wood which has been substituted for sandalwood, hence the name bandar sandalwood.

Myopotamus (mi-ô-pot'â-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. mûc, mouse, + potâmos, river. Cf. hippopotamus.] A South American genus of hystri-comorphic rodents of the family Octodontidae and the subfamily Echimyinae; the corypans. There is but one species, M. corypus. See cut under corypus.

myopid (mi-ôp'id), a. [NL., irreg. < Gr. mûc, close, + ênc, vision.] Having the cornea of the eye closed, so that the water does not touch the lens, as certain decapod cephalopods; opposed to oigopid.

myosarcoma (mi'ô-sâr-kô-mî), n.; pl. myosarcomata (-mâ-tâ). [NL., < Gr. mûc, muscle, + sârcoma, a fleshy excrescence; see sarcoma.] In pathol., a tumor composed in part of muscular and in part of sarcomatous tissue.

myosarcomatous (mi'ô-sâr-kom'â-tus), a. [Gr. myosarcoma(-t-) + -ous.] Of or pertaining to, or affected with myosarcoma.

myoscope (mi'ô-skôp), n. [Gr. mûc, muscle, + skôpein, view.] An apparatus or instrument for the observation of muscular contraction.

With the aid of an apparatus which he names the myoscope, M. F. Landolt has studied the contraction phenomena of muscles retained in their normal environment and connections. Jour. of Exp. Med. Sci., 2d ser., VI. 1. G.

myriacanthous (mir'-e-kan'thus), a. [= F. myriacanthé, < Gr. myria, number 10,000, (see myria), + kanthos, thorn, spine.] Having very nu-pl. (NL., prop. Myriopoda, neut. ^{an}

1. A traditional story in which the operations of natural forces and occurrences in human history are represented as the actions of individual living beings, especially of men, or of imaginary extra-human beings acting like men; a tale handed down from primitive times, and in form historical, but in reality involving elements of early religious views, as respecting the origin of things, the powers of nature and their workings, the rise of institutions, the history of races and communities, and the like; a legend of cosmogony, of gods and heroes, and of animals possessing wondrous gifts.—2. In a looser sense, an invented story; something purely fabulous or having no existence in fact; an imaginary or fictitious & vivid object; as, his wealthy relative was a mere myth; his having gone to Paris is a myth. Myth is thus often used as a euphemism for falsehood or lie.—3. Myth, Fable, Parable. See the quotation.

What is a myth? A myth is, in form, a narrative, resembling, in this respect, the fable, parable, and allegory. But, unlike these, the idea or feeling from which the myth springs, and which, in a sense, it embodies, is not reflectively distinguished from the narrative but rather is blended with it. The latter being, as it were, the medium in which the idea or sentiment spontaneously assumes. Moreover, there is no consciousness, on the part of those from whom the myth comes, that this product of their fancy and feeling is fiction. The fable is a fiction story, contrived to instruct a moral. The parable is a fiction story, framed for the express purpose of representing abstract truth to the imagination. Both fable and parable are the result of conscious invention. In both, the spiritual character of the narrative is distinctly recognized. From the myth, on the contrary, the element of fabrication is utterly absent. There is no questioning of its reality, no criticism or inquiry on the point, but the most passive marvelling faith.

G. F. Fisher, Supernatural Origin of Christianity, vi.

mythet, a. An obsolete spelling of myth.

myth-history (mith'hī's-tō-rī), n. History interwoven with fable; mythical history.

The Mytilaceae (mī-tī-lā-sē-ē), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), m = Gr. mytilos + -aceae.] 1. The mussel family, in a broad sense the Mytilidae. In the Mollusca's classification (1855) this family consisted of Mytilus (including Modiolus and Littoridin) and Perna.

2. A superfamily or suborder of bivalves, comprising the families Mytilidae, Aviculidae, Franseria, and those differentiated from them.

mytilacean (mit-i-lā'sh-ēn), n. and ad. I. a. Mussel-like; mytiloid or mytiliform; pertaining to the Mytilacea.

II. n. A mussel or some similar shell; any member of the Mytilacea.

mytilaceous (mit-i-lā'sh-ēn), ad. [N.L., Mytilus + -aceus.] Resembling a mussel; mytiliform; mytiloid; of or pertaining to the Mytilacea.

Mytilaspis (mit-i-lā'sp-īs), n. [N.L. (Targioni-Tozzetti, 1808), < (Gr. mytilos, a sea-mussel, + aspis, a round shield.)] A large and important genus of scale-insects, of the homopterous family Coccidae and subfamily Diaspidinae. They belong among the armored scales, and have the scale long, narrow, more or less curved, with the exuvium at the anterior extremity. The genus is cosmopolitan, as are many of its species. M. pomorum is the common oyster-shell scale-insect of the apple. Some discussion has arisen respecting the precedence of this genus or Lepidosaphes of Hübner, proposed in January, 1808, but most systematists retain Mytilaspis as the generic name. See cut under scale-insect.

Mytilidae (mī-tīl'i-dē), n. pl. [N.L. (Fleming, 1828), < Mytilus + -idae.] A family of bivalverous (bryozoanous) asiphonate bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Mytilus; the mussel. The shell is equivalve, inequilateral, thickly coated with epidermis, with a weak and generally toothless hinge and marginal ligament. The animal is diuysarian, with a large posterior and a small anterior muscle; the mantle is united by its margins behind into a fringed rudiment of an anal siphon. A well developed byssus is always present. The species are mostly marine. Mytilus, Modiolus, and Lithodanus are representative genera. These and their allies constitute the subfamily Mytilinae. See cut under Mytilus, Modiolus, Dreissena, and date-shell.

mytiliform (mī-tīl'i-fōrm), ad. [N.L., mytilus (see Mytilus), a mussel, + forma, form.] Shaped like a mussel-shell; resembling a mussel; mytiloid.

Mytilinae (mit-i-lī'nē), n. pl. [N.L., < Mytilus + -inae.] A subfamily of Mytilidae, represented by the genus Mytilus and closely related forms.

mytilite (mī-tīl'i-tē), n. [N.L., Mytilus + -ite.] A fossil mussel-shell like, or supposed to be, a member of the genus Mytilus, or referred to an old genus Mytilus.

mytiloid (mī-tīl'i-ōid), n. and ad. [N.L., mytilus (see Mytilus), a mussel, + -oid, form.] I. a. Like a mussel; mytiliform; of or pertaining to the Mytilidae.

II. n. A member of the family Mytilidae; a mussel.

mytilotoxine (mī-tīl'ō-tōk'sin), n. [N.L., < (Gr. mytilos, a sea-mussel, + toxos, poison, + -ine.] A leucocaine (C₁₇H₁₅NO₂) found in the common mussel. It is an active poison.

Mytilus (mī-tīl'us), n. [N.L., < L. mytilus, mī-tīl'us, < (Gr. mytilos, mytilos, a sea-mussel, < myc, a shell-fish); see mussel and niche.] A genus of bivalves to which very different limits have been assigned. In modern systems it is the typical genus of Mytilidae, characterized by its terminal umbones. M. edulis is the commonest mussel, found on most coasts, adhering by the byssus in multitudes to rocks, submerged wood, etc. They are often used for food, sometimes cultivated, and used in large quantities for manure. Also written Mytilus, Mytilus.

myxa (mīk'sē), n.; pl. myxæ (-sē). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, nostril, beak, also mucus; see mucus).] In ornith., the terminal part of the under mandible of a bird, as far as the symphysis or gonys extends, corresponding to the dextrum of the upper mandible. [Little used.]

myxedema (mīk'sē-dē-mā), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + E. edema.] A disease having the following characters: (1) An increase and degeneration of connective tissue over the body, so that it yields an extraordinary quantity of mucus, and hence an oedematoid condition of the skin, which does not, however, pit on pressure. This is accompanied by dystrophy of epidermic structures and failure of dermal secretions; anæsthesia, paræsthesia, neuralgia, and digestive troubles also are complained of. (2) Muscular and mental sluggishness, which may advance to extreme dementia; subnormal temperature in most cases, and high arterial tension in many. (3) Atrophy or other disease of the thyroid gland. The disease usually occurs in women over forty years of age, but has been observed in men and children. Its course is chronic, lasting six years and upward, and progressive, with occasional halts and sometimes temporary improvement.

myxedematous (mīk'sē-dē-mā's-tus), ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + E. edema.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with myxedema.

Sea mussel, Mytilus.

Myxine (mīk'sē), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, slime, + -ine.] A genus of myxonts which have a very slimy body and attach themselves to fishes by means of their sucker-like mouth, typical of the family Myxiniidae; the hags. See cut under hag, 3.

Myxiniidae (mīk'sē-nī'dē), n. pl. [N.L., < Myxine + -idae.] A family of hyperotretous marsipobranchs, cyclostomes, or myxonts, represented by the genus Myxine. (a) In Gill's ichthyological system, hags with six pairs of branchial sacs which open by ducts confluent with an inferior median canal discharging by one aperture. These hags have an elongate oel-like form, and live in the colder waters of both the northern and the southern hemisphere. They are destructive to other fishes. Often when a fish is caught upon the line, they bore into the body and feed upon the flesh. They are known as hags, hagfishes, slime-eels, and suckers. (b) In Günther's system, a family of cyclostomatous fishes whose nasal duct penetrates the orbit, including the Myxiniidae proper and the Hoplentemidae or Hellentemidae.

myxinoid (mīk'sē-nōid), ad. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Myxiniidae or Myxinoidea, or having their characters.

II. n. A myxont (a) of the family Myxiniidae or Myxinoidea, or (b) of the order Myxinoidea.

myxochondroma (mīk'sō-kōn-drō'mā), n.; pl. myxochondromata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + N.L. chondroma, q. v.)] A tumor composed of mucous tissue mixed with cartilage; myxoma united with chondroma.

myxofibroma (mīk'sō-fī-brō'mā), n.; pl. myxofibromata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + N.L. fibroma, q. v.)] A tumor composed of mucous mixed with connective tissue.

Myxogastres (mīk'sō-gās'trēs), n. pl. [N.L. (Fries), < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + gaster, stomach.)] Same as Myxomycetes.

myxogastrie (mīk'sō-gās'trīk), n. [N.L., Myxogastres + -ie.] Same as myxogastrous.

myxogastrous (mīk'sō-gās'trus), ad. [N.L., Myxogastres + -ous.] Pertaining to the Myxogastres.

myxolipoma (mīk'sō-lī-pō'mā), n.; pl. myxolipomata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + N.L. lipoma, q. v.)] A tumor composed of mucous mixed with fatty tissue.

myxoma (mīk'sō-mā), n.; pl. myxomata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + -oma.] A tumor consisting of mucous tissue—that is, a tissue with round, fusiform, or stellate cells in a transparent, semifluid, intercellular substance containing a large amount of mucin. Also called collumma.

myxomatous (mīk'sō-mā's-tus), ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + -ous.] Pertaining to a myxoma; affected with myxoma.

Myxomycetaceæ (mīk'sō-mī-sē-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + -myces.] Same as Myxomycetes.

Myxomycetes (mīk'sō-mī-sē-tēs), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + myces, pl. mycetes, a mushroom, fungus.)] A group of fungus-like organisms, the slime-molds or slime-fungi, belonging, according to the classification of De Bary, to the Mycetozoa, and numbering about 300 species. They form slimy yellow, brown, or purple (never green) masses of motile protoplasm during the period of active growth, and are then destitute of cell-wall and nucleus. Under certain conditions they secrete a cellulose wall and pass into a resting state. This resting state is brought about either by the absence of the requisite moisture, producing larger, somewhat irregular masses, the so-called sclerotium stage, or when the plasmodium seems to have concluded its vegetative period, the protoplasm then becoming heaped into a mass which breaks up internally into a large number of rounded bodies, the spores, each one of which is provided with a cell-wall. Under proper conditions these spores burst their walls and become motile nucleated masses of protoplasm (swarm-spores) which divide separately by simple fission. After a few days two or more of these swarm-spores coalesce and form new plasmodia, which differ only in size from the original. They occur on decaying logs, tan-bark, decaying mucus, etc. See Mucotona.

myxomycetous (mīk'sō-mī-sē-tus), ad. [N.L., Myxomycetes + -ous.] Pertaining to the Myxomycetes.

myxont (mīk'sōn), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + ont, pl. ontos, a smooth sea-fish, a kind of mullet, appar. < (Gr. myxa, mucus; see mucus).] A mullet of the family Mugilidae.

myxopod (mīk'sō-pōd), n. and ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + pod, pl. podes, a foot.)] I. a. A protozoan animal possessing pseudopodia, as distinguished from a manipod, one which has cilia or flagella; one of the Myxopoda. See cut under Protomyxa.

II. a. Same as myxopodous.

Myxopoda (mīk'sō-pō-dā), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + pod, pl. podes, a foot.)] Protozoans whose locomotion depends upon pseudopodia, as distinguished from manipoda, which are synonymous with Elasopoda. Huxley.

myxopodous (mīk'sō-pō-dus), ad. Of or pertaining to the Myxopoda; possessing pseudopodia. Also myxopod.

myxosarcoma (mīk'sō-sār-kō'mā), n.; pl. myxosarcomata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + sarcoma, a fleshy excrescence; see sarcoma.] A tumor composed of mucous and sarcomatous tissue.

myxosarcomatous (mīk'sō-sār-kō'mā's-tus), ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + sarcoma, a fleshy excrescence; see sarcoma.] Pertaining to a myxosarcoma.

Myxospongia (mīk'sō-spon'jā), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + spongia, a sponge; see sponge.] A division of the Spongia or Porifera, established for the reception of the genus Hall-sura, consisting of certain gelatinous sponges.

myxospore (mīk'sō-spōr), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + spora, seed.)] In certain fungi, a spore produced in the midst of a gelatinous mass, without evident differentiation of ascus or basidium as in ascospores or basidiospores.

myxosporous (mīk'sō-spō-rus), ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + -ous.] Containing, producing, or resembling a myxospore.

myxotheca (mīk'sō-thē-kā), n.; pl. myxothecæ (-sē). [N.L., < (Gr. myxa, mucus, + theca, a sheath.)] The inferior unguliform of a bird's bill, or horny sheath of the end of the lower mandible, corresponding to the dactylothea of the upper mandible.

Myzomela (mī-zō-mē-lā), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, mitter, + melos, song.)] The typical genus of the Myzomelinae, containing most of the species of the subfamily, nearly 30 in number. The bill is long and slender, and curved; the tail is two thirds as long as the wing; the coloration of the males is chiefly black and red, with or without yellow on the under parts, and that of the females is generally plain olive above. M. cardinalis is known as the cardinal honey eater; M. sanguinolenta as the sanguineous or cochineal creeper; the former inhabits New Hebrides, the latter Australia.

Myzomelinae (mī-zō-mē-lī'nē), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, mitter, + melos, song.)] A subfamily of Meliphagidae, typified by the genus Myzomela.

myzomeline (mī-zō-mē-līn), ad. Pertaining to the Myzomelinae, or having their characters.

myzont (mī-zōnt), n. and ad. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, mitter, + ont, pl. ontos, a smooth sea-fish, a kind of mullet, appar. < (Gr. myxa, mucus; see mucus).] I. a. Sucking or suetorial, as a lamprey or hag; of or pertaining to the Myzontes; cyclostomes or marsipobranchiate, as a fish.

II. n. Any member of the Myzontes; a lamprey or hag.

Myzontes (mī-zōn'tēs), n. pl. [N.L., pl. of myzont; see myzont.] A class of vertebrates in which the skull is incompletely developed and there is no lower jaw. The brain is distinctly developed. The heart is also well developed, and partitioned into an auricle and a ventricle. The gills have a pouch-like form. In the adult the mouth is circular and suetorial. The Myzontes are the lampreys and hags, representing two orders, Hyporhamphidae and Hyporhamphidae. Also called Cyclostomata, Marsipobranchia, and Monorhina.

Myzostomida (mī-zō-stōm'i-dā), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, mitter, + stoma, mouth.)] An order of doubtful affinities, referred by some to the worms and by others approximated to the mites. It comprises symmetrical animals provided with an external chitinous cuticle, five pairs of movable parapodia, each with a hook and supporting rod, and an alimentary canal with oral and anal apertures, through which latter the eggs are extruded. They are parasitic on and in crinoids. Also Myzostomata.

Myzostomidae (mī-zō-stōm'i-dē), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, mitter, + stoma, mouth.)] A family of Myzostomida with ramified alimentary canal, parapodia connected by muscles which converge to a central muscular mass, body-cavity divided into paired chambers by incomplete septa, and usually four pairs of suckers. They are hermaphrodite or dioecious; the ova are evacuated through a cloaca; and the male generative apertures are situated laterally.

myzostomous (mī-zōs'tō-mus), ad. Of or pertaining to the Myzostomida or having their characters.

Myzostomum (mī-zōs'tō-mum), n. [N.L., < (Gr. myzo, suck, + stoma, the mouth.)] The typical genus of Myzostomidae, comprehending certain small creatures which are parasitic upon crinoids. They are not over one fifth of an inch in length, and have the form of a flattened disk. See cut under Myzostoma of Leuckart, 1837.

1. The fourteenth letter and eleventh consonant in the English alphabet, having a corresponding place also in the alphabets from which ours comes. The comparative scheme of forms in these alphabets and in the Egyptian (see 2) is as follows:

Egyptian Hieroglyphic. Hieratic. Phoenician. Greek and Latin

The value of the character has been the same through the whole history of its use. It stands for the "dental" nasal, the nasal sound corresponding to d and t, as does n to b and p, and ng to g and k. This sound, namely, implies for its formation the same check or mute-contact as d and t, with constant vibration of the vocal cords as in d and t, and further with enclosure of the passage from the mouth into the nose, and nasal resonance there. Among the nasals, it is by far the most common in English pronunciation (more than twice as common as m, and eight times as common as ng). While all the nasals are sibilic or liquid, n is the only one which (like l, but not more than half as often) is used with vocalic value in syllable-making, namely, in unaccented syllables, where an accompanying vowel, formerly uttered, is now silenced: examples are taken, rat, open, lean, mean, mean, mean; such form, on an average, about one in eight hundred of English syllables. The sign n has no variety of sounds; but before ch, j, in the same syllable (as in inch, king) it takes on a slightly modified — a palatalized — character; and similarly it is gutturalized, or pronounced as ng, before k and g (hard), as in ink, finger; and its digraph ny (see g) is the usual representative of the guttural or back-palatal nasal, which in none of our alphabets has a letter to itself. N is doubled under the same circumstances as other consonants, and in a few words (as kila, dama, hymal) is silent. In the phonetic history of our family of languages, n is on the whole a constant sound; that is to say, there is no other sound into which it passes on a large scale; but its loss, with accompanying vowel-modification, has been a frequent process.

2. As a medieval numeral, 90, and with a stroke over it (N), 90,000.—3. In chem., the symbol for nitrogen.—4. [l. c. or cap.] In math., an indefinite constant whole number, expressed by the degree of a quantifier or an equation, or the class of a curve.—5. An abbreviation (a) of north or northern; (b) [l. c.] of noun (so used in this work); (c) [l. c.] of neuter; (d) [l. c.] of naut (or nails), a measure.

na (ná), adv. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of not.

Na. In chem., the symbol for sodium (NL. natrum).

N.A. An abbreviation (a) of North America, or North American; (b) of National Academy, or National Academician; (c) in microscopy, of numerical aperture (see objective).

naam, n. An archaic form of *nam*².

naambarr (nám'bár), n. [Australian.] The prickly tea-tree, Melaleuca styphelioides, of New South Wales. It is a tall tree with hard wood, almost imperishable under ground, the bark in thin layers, used for stretching, etc.

nab¹ (nab), v. t.; pr. t. and pp. nabbed, ppr. nabbing. [Formerly also knab, as var. of *knapp*¹; but also nab, < Sw. nappa = Dan. napp, catch, snatch at, seize: see *napp*².] To catch or seize suddenly or by a sudden thrust and grasp. (a) To seize and make off with: as, to nab a purse. (b) To capture or arrest: as, he was nabbed by the police. [Colloq.]

As, but if so be a man's nabbed, you know.

nab² (nab), n. [For knab, var. of *knapp*², as knob of knop. Cf. Ice. nabbi, a knob, knoll.] 1. The summit of a mountain or rock; any piece of rising ground: same as knob (c).

Will you just turn this nab of head, and walk into my house? E. Brontë, Wuthering Heights, xli. (Dialect.)

nab, n. The cock of a gun-lock. E. H. Knight.

nab, n. A projecting box screwed to the jamb of a door, or to one door of a pair, to receive the latch or bolt, or both, of a rim-lock.—4. A hat; a head-covering.

Off with your hats! Four, the knap on my hat. Anglo-Saxon, Recording Office, II. 2.

There were those who preferred the Nab, or trencher hat, with the brim flapping over their eyes.

Nabalus (nab'á-lus), n. [NL. (Cassini, 1826); according to Gray so called (in allusion to its lyrate leaves) < Gr. νάβη, a harp; according to others, from a N. Amer. name for the rattlesnake-root.] An important section of Fraxinoides, containing all the American species, long regarded as a distinct genus of plants, the rattlesnake-roots.

Nabatman, Nabatean (nab-á-tō'an), n. and n. [Also Nabathian; < LL. Nabateri, Nabuthari, < Gr. Ναβαῖται, also Ναβάρται, < Heb. Nebháyoth: see def.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Nabateans: as, Nabatean kings; Nabatean inscriptions.

II. n. One of the Arab people dwelling in ancient times on the east and southeast of Palestine, often identified with the people mentioned in the Old Testament under the name of Nebathoth (Isa. ix. 7), and in the first book of Maccabees (v. 25) as Nabathites. Their ancestor Nabath is spoken of as the first-born of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13). They are referred to in Assyrian inscriptions of the seventh century B. C., but the period of their greatest historical importance was the century immediately preceding and that immediately succeeding the Christian era. They seem to have been for a long time the chief traders between Egypt and the valley of the Euphrates. Important Nabathian inscriptions have been recovered, and the rock-inscriptions in the valleys around Mount Khaf have been attributed to them.

Nabathite (nab'á-thít), n. [As Nabath (see def.) + -ite.] Same as Nabatean.

nab-cheat, n. [*< nab*², 4, + *cheat*³.] A cap: n hat.

Thus we throw up our nab-cheats, first for jay.

Mitcher, Beggar's Bush, II. 1.

nabee (nab'ē), n. [E. Ind.] Same as bikh.

nabk (nabk), n. [Ar. (?)]. One of the plants which is alleged to have furnished the crown of thorns, Zizyphus Spina-Christi, a bush of northern Africa and adjacent parts of Asia.

nabob (nab'ob), n. [Also (in defn. 1, 2) nabab; cf. F. nabab = Sp. nabab = Pg. nababo = It. naba = t. nabab, a nabob (def. 3); < E.; < Hind. nawab, a deputy governor, < Ar. nawwab, pl. (used as sing. as a title of honor) of nāib (Turk. nāib), a deputy, vicar; cf. nawb, supplying the place of another.] 1. A vicar or governor of a province in India under the Mogul empire; as, the nabob of Oudh; the nabob of Surat. The nabob was, properly speaking, a subordinate provincial governor, who acted under a soubah or viceroys.—2. An honorary title occasionally conferred upon Mohammedans of distinction.—3. An Anglo-Indian who has acquired great wealth and lives in Eastern luxury; hence, any very rich and luxurious man. [Colloq.]

He that goes out an insignificant boy in a few years returns a great Nabob.

Durke, On Fox's E. I. Bill (Works, ed. 1852, III. 306).

The Indian adventurer, or, as he was popularly called, the Nabob, was now a conspicuous and a very unpopular figure in Parliament.

nacarat (nak'á-rat), n. [< F. nacarat, < Sp. Pg. nacarado, < Sp. nacar, Pg. nacar, mother-of-pearl, naere: see nacre.] 1. A light-red color; scarlet.

A small box I had bought for its brilliancy, of some tropic shell of the colour called nacarat. C. Brontë, Villotte, xlii.

2. A craps or fine linen fabric dyed fugitively of this color and used by women to give a rosate hue to their complexions. Brande.

nacher, n. An obsolete variant of *natch*².

nache-bonet, n. An obsolete variant of natch-bone.

nacker, n. Another spelling of *knacker*².

nacket (nak'et), n. [< OF. naquer, late, gnaw.]

1. A small cake or loaf.—2. A luncheon; a piece of bread eaten at noon.

Triptolemus . . . seldom saw half so good a dinner as his guest's luncheon, . . . and even the lady herself . . . could not but say that the young gentleman's nacket looked very good. Scott, Pirata, xi.

3. A small parcel or packet. [Scotch in all uses.]

nacre (ná'kér), n. [Formerly naker; < F. nacre, OF. nacra = Pr. nacra = Sp. nacar, nacra = Pg. nacar = It. nacaro, nacchera, gnacchera, nacra, < ML. nacra, nacer, nacrum, a pearl-shell, naere; cf. Kurdish nákara, an ornament of different colors, naere, < Ar. nakir, hollowed out, nakrat, small round hollow, nakara, hollow out; Heb. nákar, dig, neckárah, a pit. Cf. *naker*¹.] Mother-of-pearl. Nacre of commercial value is obtained from many sources, as the top-shells (Turbinidae), lower shells (Trachidae), oarshells (Haliotidae), river-mussels (Unionidae), pearl-oyster shells (Arctiidae), etc.

nacré (nak-rá'), a. [< F., < nacre, naere: see nacre.] Having an iridescence resembling that of mother-of-pearl; nacréous, a French word applied in English to decorative objects: as, nacré porcelain.

nacreous (ná'kré-us), a. [< nacre + -ous.] 1. Consisting of, resembling, or pertaining to naere or mother-of-pearl: as, a nacreous luster; a nacreous layer.—2. Producing or possessing naere, as shells which have a certain luster or lustrous layer on their inner surface.

nadder, nadt. Contracted Middle English form of ne hadder, had not. Chaucer.

nadder (nad'er), n. [< ME. naddir, naddra, nadder, an adder: see *adder*¹.] The earlier form of *adder*¹.

O servant (traytour, false, hoonly hewe, lyk to the nadder (var. nadder) in bowen dy, untrowe. Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, I. 142.

Thel spoke not, but thei maken a manner of hysynge, ad a Nadder dothe. Handerille, Travels, p. 300.

nadir (ná'dér), n. [< ME. nadir, < OF. nadir, nadir, F. nadir = Sp. Pg. It. nadir, < Ar. Pers. nazir, in full nazir assamit, nadir, lt. corresponding to the zenith, < nazir, alike, corresponding (< nazara, to alike), + as-samit, the zenith, the azimuth: see azimuth, zenith.] 1. That point of the heavens which is vertically below any station upon the earth. It is diametrically opposite to the zenith, or point of the heavens vertically above the station. The zenith and the nadir are thus the two poles of the horizon, the nadir being the inferior pole.

The two theories differed as widely as the zenith from the nadir in their main principles.

Hawthorne, Middlemarch, vii.

Hence—2. The lowest point; the point of extreme depression.

The reign of William the Third, as Mr. Hallam happily says, was the Nadir of the national prosperity.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

nail (nāl), n. [Early mod. E. also naile; < ME. naile, naile, naile; < AS. nael (in inflection nael), a nail of the finger or toe, a nail of metal, = OE. nael = OFries. nael, nael = D. nael = MLG. nael, nael = OHG. nael, MHG. nael, G. nael, a nail of the finger or toe, a nail of metal, = Icel. nael = Sw. nael = Dan. nael, a nail of the finger or toe, = Icel. nael = Sw. nael = Dan. nael = Goth. naels* (in deriv. verb ga-nagjan, fasten with nails), a nail of metal; cf. OHG. naegil = Serv. nokat = Bohem. nohet = Pol. nopec = Russ. no-got = Lith. naugas, a nail, claw, = Skt. nakha, a nail of the finger or toe. Not related, or related only remotely, by a doubtful transposition, with OIr. ingra, Ir. ingra = L. unguis = Gr. ónix (or ónix), a nail, claw (see ungulate, onyx). The sense of 'a nail of metal' occurs early (in Goth., etc.), but it is derived from that of a 'nail' or 'claw.' 1. A thin, flat, blunt layer of horn growing on the upper side of the end of a finger or toe. A nail, technically called unguis, consists of horny substance, which is condensed and hardened epidermis, the same as that forming the horns, hoofs, and claws of various animals. A claw is a sharp curved nail; a hoof is a blunt nail large enough to inclose the end of a digit. The white mark at the base of the human nail is called the lunula.

Pure elene thy nails. Robert Hook (E. E. T. A.), p. 22.

With their sharp Nails, themselves the Satyr's wound.

Cambray, Death of Queen Mary.

2. In entom., the uncus. — 3. In ornith., the hard horny end of the bill of any lamellirostral bird, as a duck or goose. It is usually quite distinct from the alary part of the bill, and resembles a human finger-nail. A similar formation, but more claw-like, occupies the end of the upper mandible of various other water-birds, as the pelican.

4. The callosity on the inner side of a horse's leg, near the knee or the hock. — 5. A pin or slender piece of metal used for driving through or into wood or other material for the purpose of holding separate pieces together, or left projecting that things may be hung on it. Nails usually taper to a point (often blunt), are flattened transversely in the larger end (the head), and are rectangular or round in section. Very large and heavy nails are called spikes.

1. Naiad Plant of Najas flexilis, the fruit.

2. Cross-section of Human Nail, enlarged.

3. The nail, 2. Lateral fold of skin, 3. The nail, with its bed.

'that by which a thing is known', from the root gnō*, *Teut. gnā, Gr. γινώσκω, L. noscere, gnoscere* = AS. egnān, E. know (see know), but this view ignores phonetic difficulties in the relations of the above forms, and fails to explain the appar. cognate Ir. ainm, W. enw, and OHG. imc = Serv. ime = Bohem. ime, jueno = Pol. imie = Russ. imya = OFries. emme, name. It seems probable that all the words cited are actually related, and that the appar. irregularities are due to interference or conformation.

From the L. form are ult. E. nominal, nominate, etc., cognomen, etc., noun, pronoun, renown, etc., with the technical nom, nomine, agnomen, nominal, biominal, etc.; from the Gr. are ult. E. synonym, patronym, patronymic, metronymic, etc., onym, mononym, polyonym, etc. From the E. noun are name, nether.] 1. A word by which a person or thing is denoted; the word or words by which an individual person or thing, or a class of persons or things, is designated, and distinguished from others; appellation; designation.

In most communities of European civilization at the present day the name a person bears is double, consisting of the family name or surname and the Christian or distinctly personal name, which latter ordinarily precedes the surname, but in some countries stands last. Either of these name-elements may and (the personal name especially) often does consist of two or more names as component parts. An ancient Roman of historical times had necessarily two names, one designating his family or gens, the nomen or nomen gentis, and the other, the praenomen, distinguishing the individual; as, Quintus Marcius—that is, Quintus of the gens of the Marci. Every Roman citizen belonged also to a family, a branch or subdivision of his gens, and hence had or might have a third name, or cognomen, referring to the family. This cognomen was always borne by men of patrician estate; and in the case of men of distinction a fourth name or epithet (agnomen, agnomen, or agnomen) was sometimes added, in reference to some notable achievement of the individual. Thus, Lucius Cornelius Scipio Africanus was Lucius of the Scipio branch of the Cornelius gens, who had won personal distinction in Asia. Women as a rule bore only the feminine form of the name of their gens; as, Cornelia, Terentia. But sometimes, especially at a comparatively late date, they received also an individual praenomen, which was the feminine form of the praenomen of

The Book of the Dead was given to them, as in the case of the Book of the Dead.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.

Who, never naming God except for gain,
Has never lost that useful name in vain.

—Syn. 1. Name, Appellation, Title, Designation, Denomination, Style. Name is the simplest and most general word for that by which any person or thing is called, as, "His name is John." Luke i. 33. An appellation is a descriptive and therefore specific term, as Saint Louis, John's appellation was the Baptist; George Washington has the appellation of Father of his Country. A title is an official or honorary appellation, as reverend, bishop, doctor, colonel, duke. A designation is a distinctive appellation or title, marking the individual, as Charles the Simple, James the Less. Denomination is to a class what designation is to an individual: as, coin of various denominations; a common use of the word is in application to a separate or independent Christian body or organization. Style may be essentially the same as appellation, but it is now generally limited to a name assumed or assigned for public use: as, the style of his most Christian Majesty; they transacted business under the firm style of Smith & Co.—4. Repute, credit, note.

name¹ (nām), v. t.; pret. and pp. named, ppr. nam-ing. [ME. namen, AS. genamian = ON. namon = OFries. nomia, nama, from the noun: see name 1, n. napha-water (náf'fá-wá'tér), n. A fragrant perfume distilled from orange-flowers.

naphew (náf'fú), n. See naper.

naphtha (náf'thá or náf'thá'), n. [Formerly also naphtha, naphtha; = F. naphte = Sp. H. nafta = Pg. naphtha, < L. naphtha, < Gr. naphtha, also váphos, a kind of asphalt or bitumen (see def.).] 1. In ancient writers, a more fluid and volatile variety of asphalt or bitumen. They hesitate about including naphtha with bitumen, on account of its volatility and inflammability.

It (an oil in which arrows were steeped) was composed of Naphtha.
Peregrinus, Pilgrimage, p. 346.

Starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light

As from a sky.
Milton, P. L., l. 729.

2. In modern use, an artificial volatile colorless liquid obtained from petroleum. It is a general term applied to the products of the distillation of crude petroleum between gasoline and refined oil. Ordinary petroleum now yields from 5 to 15 per cent. of this material, the specific gravity of which is from 70 to 80 (Beancet). Naphtha as a solvent has largely taken the place of turpentene, camphene, benzol, and other similar products in industrial use, being often superior, and always much less expensive. In this way it is used in the manufacture of rubber goods, paints and varnishes, floor- and table-cloths; also by dyers and clothing- and glove-cleaners. In its many applications for light and heat it is very largely taking the place both of coal and crude oil for the manufacture of illuminating gas and for street-lighting by naphthalene lamps, as well as for cooking by vapor stoves in the use of the grade called store-pandura.

naphthalene (náf'thá-len), n. [< naphtha + al(cokol) + -ene.] A benzene hydrocarbon (C₁₀H₈) usually prepared from coal-tar. It forms white crystalline lumps, having a peculiar odor. It is used internally as an intestinal antiseptic and as an expectorant. It is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether. Naphthalene derivatives form an important group of coal-tar colors. Also naphthalin, naphthalin. Naphthalene red, a coal tar color used in dyeing, obtained from naphthylamine, belonging to the induline class. It is used for producing light shades on silk. Also known as Maydala red.

naphthalin (náf'thá-lín), n. [< naphtha + al(cokol) + -in.] Same as naphthalene.

naphthalize (náf'thá-líz), v. t.; pret. and pp. naphthalized, ppr. naphthalizing. [< naphtha (cf. naphthalene) + -ize.] To impregnate or saturate with naphtha; enrich (an inferior gas) or carburize (air) by passing it through naphtha.

naphthameln (náf-thám'el-in), n. [< naphtha + am(ine) + -el + -in.] A coal-tar color used in dyeing, formed by oxidizing alpha-naphthylamine. It is in some respects similar to aniline black, and produces grays and violets, but not very fast. Also called naphthalene violet.

naphthol (náf'thól), n. [< naphtha + -ol.] Any one of the phenols of naphthalene having the formula C₁₀H₇OH. One of the group, beta naphthol, is an antiseptic, and is used locally in skin diseases. Also called naphtholum and naphthol. Naphthol blue, a coal tar color used in dyeing, prepared by the action of nitroso dimethyl-aniline on alpha-naphthol. It gives colors similar to indigo, moderately fast to light but sensitive to acids. Naphthol green. See green. - Naphthol yellow. See yellow.

naphtholize (náf'thól-líz), v. t. To saturate or impregnate with the vapor of naphtha.

naphthylamine (náf-thíl'a-mín), n. [< naphtha + Gr. -am, wood, matter, & amine.] A chemical base (C₁₀H₇NH₂) obtained from nitronaphthalene by reducing it with iron filings and acetic acid. It occurs in fine crystals, insoluble in water and having a disgusting odor. It unites with acids to form crystallizable salts and is the source of certain coal tar dyes.

naphthyllic (náf-thíl'ík), a. [< naphtha + -yl + -ic.] Containing or relating to naphthalene.

napier-cloth (náp'ér-kloth), n. A double-faced cloth, having one side of wool, and the other of goat's hair from Cashmere or of vicuña hair or wool from South America.

Napierian (náp'ér-i-an), a. [< Napier (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to John Napier (1550-1617), famous as the inventor of logarithms. - logarithmic. Also Neperian.

Napier's analogies, rods (or bones), etc. See analogies, rods, etc.

napifolious (náp-i-fó-li-us), a. [< L. nappus, a turnip, + folium, a leaf.] Having leaves like those of the turnip.

napiform (náp-i-fórm), a. [< L. nappus, a turnip (see nape) + forma, form.] Having the shape of a turnip - that is, enlarged in the upper part and slender below; as, a napiform root.

napkin (náp'kín), n. [< ME. napekin; < nape + -kin.] 1. A handkerchief; a kerchief of any kind.

And dip their napkins in the sacred blood.

Shak. J. A., iii, 2, 13.

And take a napkin in your hand,

And tie up hault your bloody ren

Clerk Saunders (Child's Ballads, II, 46).

She hang as napkin at the door

Another in the ha'

And a' to wipe the trickling tears

See fast as they did fly

Fair Anne (Child's Ballads, III, 195).

2. A small square piece of linen cloth, now usually damask, used at table to wipe the lips and hands and to protect the clothes.

Get your napkins and spoons - in the cupboard ready,

and lay every man a trencher, a napkin, & a spoon

Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 69.

Here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a nap kin.

The napkins white, the carpet red

The guests withdrawn had left the treat

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II, vi, 102.

napkin-ring (náp'kín-ring), n. A ring in which a table-napkin may be held folded or rolled up when not in use.

napless (náp'les), a. [< nape + -less.] 1. Having no nap, as many textile fabrics. - 2. Much worn; deprived of its nap by wear; threadbare.

North would be Appear! the market-place, nor on him put
The napless rapture of humility.

Shak., Cor., II, i, 120.

Naples yellow. See yellow.

nap-meter (náp'mé'tér), n. A machine designed to test the wearing quality of cloth. It consists of a double-flanged wheel on which a piece of cloth attached to it is caused to rotate against reaps under a fixed pressure. The number of rotations is shown by counting wheels and dials and the endurance of the cloth is shown by the number of rotations required to wear it threadbare.

napoleon (na-pó'le-on), n. [< F. napoléon, a coin so called after Napoleon Bonaparte.] 1. A modern French gold coin of the value of 20 francs, or slightly less than $4; a twenty-franc piece, or pièce de vingt francs. See Louis. - 2.

A French modification of the game of enche, played by not more than six persons, every one for himself. The American Hay. Also nap.

Napoleon blue, gun, etc. See blue, etc.

Napoleonic (ná-po'le-on'ík), a. [< Napoleon (see def.) + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of either of the emperors Napoleon (Napoleon I. (Bonaparte), born 1768 or 1769, died 1821, and Napoleon III., born 1808, died 1873), or their dynasty.

Napoleonism (ná-po'le-on-izm), n. [< Napoleon + -ism.] 1. The political system, theory, methods, etc., of the Napoleonic dynasty, of its traditions. - 2. Attachment to the Napoleonic dynasty; Bonapartist partizanship; same as Bonapartism.

Monty Carrère, in his able and fascinating book on "The Moral Order of the World," begins with thanksgiving for the downfall of Napoleonism.

N. A. Rev., CXXVII, 457.

Napoleonist (ná-po'le-on-ist), n. [< Napoleon + -ist.] A supporter of the Napoleonic dynasty; same as Bonapartist.

napoleonite (ná-po'le-on-ít), n. [< Napoleon + -ite.] A granitic rock composed of quartz, feldspar and hornblende with a little quartz, these being concentrically grouped so as to form layers of alternately lighter and darker shade. It is a variety of conglomerate. Also sometimes called orbicular diorite.

nappe (náp), n. [< F. n cloth, table-cloth, sheet or surface (as of water, etc.); see nape.] A surface swelling out from a point in the form of a cone or hyperboloid about its vertex. - Jet nappe, a nappe formed by a jet impinging normally on the rounded end of a rod.

The dimensions of the apparatus may be varied to suit jets of different sizes. It is highly desirable, however, that the jet nappe should well overlap the inner margin of the ring shaped electrode.

Science, VII, 601.

napper¹ (náp'ér), n. [< nap + -er.] One who naps or slumbers.

napper² (náp'ér), n. [< nap + -er.] An implement used to nap or smooth cloth or knitted goods. Specifically (a) A mallet or beetle for this purpose. (b) A machine by which knitted goods are cleaned, napped, and surfaced. It consists essentially of a roller on which the goods are stretched and brushed with a card or tinsel, to remove specks, burrs, etc., to raise the nap, and restore the softness and pliancy of which the fabric has been deprived by washing.

napper³ (náp'ér), n. [< nape + -er.] In England, the holder of an honorary office at a coronation or other royal function. The office is connected with that of chief butler, and is implied by the carrying of a napkin.

Rev. George Herbert applied for the office of Napper, which was refused.

List of Clergy to Serve at Coronation of Geo. IV.

napperer (náp'ér-ér), n. [< napper (y) + -er.]

1. A person who makes or supplies napery. -

2. Same as napper.

napperty (náp'ér-ti), n. Same as knapperty.

nappery, n. An obsolete form of napery.

nappiness (náp'í-nés), n. [< nappy + -ness.]

The quality of being nappy, or having a nap; abundance of nap, as on cloth.

napping (náp'ing), n. [Verbal n. of nape.] In hat-making, a sheet of partially felted fur before it is united to the hat-body. E. H. Knight.

napping-machine (nap'ing-ma-shēn'), n. A machine for raising, trimming, or shearing the nap of cloth.

nappy (nap'i), a. and n. [Prob. < nap + -y.] I. a. 1. Headly; strong: applied to ale or beer. Nappy ale, so called because, if you taste it thoroughly, it will either catch you by the nape of the neck or cause you to take a nap of sleep. Mitchell.

With nappy beer I to the barn repair'd Gay, Shepherd's Week, Tuesday, l. 54.

But most, his v'ner love a faithful jest
Thy coat is thin: why, man, thou'rt barely dressed;
It's woe to the thread, but I have nappy beer,
Clap that within, and see how they will wear!

Crabbe, Works, l. 130.

2. Tipsy; slightly elevated or intoxicated with drink. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

We are to vex you mightily for plucking Elderton out of the napes of his ale, and not letting him enjoy his nappy muse of ballad making to himself.

Nash, Four Letters Confuted.

The carles grew nappy. Pattie's Wedding. (Jannetown.)

II. n. Strong ale. [Scotch.]

An' whiles, twapenno-worth o' nappy
Can mak the bodie a mick happy.

Burns, The Two Dogs.

nappy (nap'i), a. [< nap + -y.] Covered with nap; having abundance of nap on the surface: as, a nappy cloth.

Thou burr that only stickest to nappy fortunes!

Murdan and Webster, Malcontent, ll. 3.

naraka (nar'g-kā), n. [Hind.] In post-Vedic Hind. myth. and in Buddhism, the place of torture for departed evil-doers, represented as consisting of numerous hot and cold hells, which have been variously described.

narcole (nar'sō'le), n. [NL., < L. narce = Gr. νάρκη, numbness, torpor.] Same as narceine.

narceine (nar'sē-in), n. [L. narce, numbness, torpor, & -ine.] An alkaloid (C₂₂H₂₉NO₉) contained in opium. It is sparingly soluble in water and alcohol. It forms fine silky fibrous bitter crystals. Narceine is sometimes used in medicine as a substitute for morphine.

narcessine (nar'sis'in), n. [L. narcissus, < Gr. νάρκισσος, of the narcissus, < νάρκη, numbness; see narcissus.] Relating to or resembling plants of the genus Narcissus.

narcissus (nar'sis'us), n. [= F. narcissus = Sp. narciso = Fr. H. narcissus, < L. narcissus = Pers. nargis = Gr. νάρκη, a plant, a narcissus, so called from its narcotic qualities, < νάρκη, numbness, torpor; see narcotic.] 1. A plant of the genus Narcissus. See cut under cytha- form.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants of the order Amaryllidaceae and the tribe Amaryllideae, known by its undivided cup-shaped corolla. There are about 20 species, mainly European, with narrow upright leaves from a central bulb; they are favorite garden-plants, mostly hardy, bearing the conspicuous yellow or white, often fragrant, blossoms in early spring, also much employed for forcing. N. poeticus, the poet's narcissus, has white flowers, the crown, edged with pink, scarcely projecting from the throat. N. biflorus, with the scapes two-flowered and the crown forming a short cup, is the primrose peerless of the old gardeners. N. polyanthus and N. tazetta, with variegated, have the flowers numerous, and are called polyanthus narcissus. N. odoratus and others furnish oils or essences to the perfumer. For other species, see bell-flower, 2, daffodil, jonquil, butter-and-cups and hoop-petticoat. See also cuts under daffodil and jonquil.

3. In her., a flower composed of six petals, or a sort of hexafol or architectural ornament of six lobes, used as a bearing.

narcolepsy (nar'kō-lep-si), n. [< NL. narca(sis) + F. (epi)lepsy.] 1. A condition characterized by a tendency to fall into a short sleep on all occasions.—2. Petit mal, when presenting a simple brief loss of consciousness.

narcoma (nar'kō-mā), n. [< Gr. νάρκη, numbness, + -oma.] Stupor produced by narcotics.

narcomatous (nar'kō-mā-tūs), a. [< narcoma(-t) + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of narcoma.

Narcomedusa (nar'kō-mē-du'sē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. νάρκη, numbness, + NL. Medusa; see Medusa, 2.] In Haeckel's classification, an order of Hydromedusa, in which the marginal bodies or sense-organs are tentaculicysts, and the genitalia are in the wall of the manubrium or in pouch-like manubrial outgrowths. Also spelled Narkomedusa.

narcomedusan (nar'kō-mē-du'sun), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Narcomedusa, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Narcomedusa.

narcose (nar'kō-sē), a. [< Gr. νάρκη, numbness, + -ose.] Narcotic.

narcosis (nar'kō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. νάρκη, a benumbing, < νάρκη, benumb, render unconscious; see narcotic.] In pathol., the stupefying effect of a narcotic; narcotism.—Nussbaum's narcosis, the condition produced by a dose of morphine followed by the administration of chloroform.

narcotic (nar'kō-tik), a. and n. [*< Gr. νάρκωσις, making stiff or numb, narcotic, < νάρκη, benumb, < νάρκη, numbness, torpor, perhaps orig. νάρκη, related to F. snare and narrow.] I. a. 1. Having the power to produce stupor.

Narcotic medicines are those that benumb and stupify with their coldness, as opium, hemlock, and such like. Holland, tr. of Pliny, Explanation of the Words of Art.

2. Consisting in or characterized by stupor: as, narcotic effects.

II. n. A substance which directly induces sleep, allaying sensibility and blunting the senses, and which, in large quantities, produces narcotism or complete insensibility. Opium, Cannabis Indica, hyoscyamus stramonium, and belladonna are the chief narcotics, of which opium is the most typical.

Direct narcotics . . . either produce some specific effect upon the cerebral gray matter, or have a very decided action on the blood-supply of the brain.

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1018.

narcotical (nar'kō-tik-əl), a. [< narcotic + -al.] Same as narcotic.

narcotically (nar'kō-tik-əl-ē), adv. After the manner of a narcotic; by means of a narcotic.

narcoticalness (nar'kō-tik-əl-nēs), n. The property of being narcotic, or of operating as a narcotic.

narcotichness (nar'kō-tik-nēs), n. Same as narcoticalness. Bailey, 1727.

narcotine (nar'kō-tin), n. [< narcotic + -ine.] A crystallized alkaloid of opium, C₂₂H₂₉NO₉. It is white, odorless, and tasteless. It was at first supposed to be the narcotic principle of opium, but this has been shown to be a mistake, as narcotine is possessed of little if any narcotic power. It is said to be a tonic and antipyretic.

narcotinic (nar'kō-tin-ik), a. [< narcotine + -ic.] Pertaining to narcotine; applied to an acid formed when narcotine is heated with potash.

narcotism (nar'kō-tizm), n. [< narcotic + -ism.] The influence exerted by narcotics, or the effects produced by their use.

narcotize (nar'kō-tiz), v. t. pret. and pp. narcotized, ppr. narcotizing. [< narcotic + -ize.] To bring under the influence of a narcotic; affect with narcotism.

nard (nārd), n. [< ME. narde, < OF. (and F.) nard = Sp. Pg. It. nardo = OHG. narda, MHG. G. narde, < L. nardus = Gr. νάρδος, nard, < Pers.

nard, < Skt. nālada, Indian spike-nard.] 1. A plant: same as spikenard. See Nardostachys. Or have smelt o' the bud of the briar?
Or the nard in the fire?

R. Johnson, Devil is an Ass, 1600.

2. An aromatic unguent prepared from this plant.

While the Hebrew in his sumptuous Chamber Disports himself, perfume'd with Nard and Amber, Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ll. The Decay.

3. Same as mat-grass, 2. See also Nardus.

4. A European plant, Valeriana Celtica, formerly used in medicine; also, one of other species of valerian.

nard (nārd), v. t. [< nard, n.] To anoint with nard.

She took the body of my past delight,
Narded and swathed and balm'd it for herself.

Tennyson, Lover's Tale, l.

nardine (nārd'in), a. [< nard + -ine.] Pertaining to nard; having the qualities of spike-nard.

nardoo (nārd'ō), n. [Native Australian.] An Australian plant, Marsilea Drummondii (M. macrospora of Hooker). Its spores or spore cases are pounded by the natives, and made into gruel and porridge.

Nardostachys (nārd-ōs'tā-kis), n. [NL., < Gr. νάρδος, spike-nard, < νάρκη, nard, + στάχυς, an ear of grain, a spike; see nard and stachys.] A genus of aromatic plants of the order Valerianaceae, known by its purple flowers with four stamens. There are 2 species, natives of the Himalayas, with thick fragrant rootstocks, producing long narrow leaves and dense clusters of flowers. See jatamansi and spikenard.

Nardus (nārd'us), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), an arbitrary transfer of L. nardus = Gr. νάρδος, nard; see nard.] A genus of plants of the order Gramineae and the tribe Hordeae, known by the absence of the empty glumes and of the stalklet beyond the flower. There is but one species, N. stricta. See mat-grass, 2.

nare (nār), n. [< L. naris, a nostril, usually in pl. nares, the nostrils, the nose, akin to nasus, nose; see nasal, nase, hence narel.] A nostril; especially, the nostril of a hawk.

Yet no nare was tabited,
Nor thumb, nor finger to the stop acquainted,
But open, and unarm'd.

narrow-work (nar'ô-wérk), n. In coal-mining, all the work done in the mine in the way of opening it, previous to the removal of the pillars; nearly the same as dead work, or that which is done preparatory to beginning to take out the coal.

narry, a. See nary.

narth. A contracted form of ne art, art not.

Narthecium (nâr-thô'gi-um), n. [NL. (Möhrling, 1742), < Gr. nârthê, a tall hollow-stemmed umbelliferous plant; see narthex.] A genus of herbs of the order Liliaceae, type of the tribe Nartheciae, known by its single style, stiff open flowers, and rigid linear leaves in two ranks, rising from a creeping rootstock. There are 4 species, of north temperate regions, with yellow flowers in racemes. The name bag-anaphel, applied to the genus, belongs especially to N. ossifragum, the Lancashire apoplexy of England, and N. Americanum, a rare plant of New Jersey.

narthex (nâr'theks), n. [NL. < L. narthex, < Gr. nârthê, a tall hollow-stemmed umbelliferous plant (L. ferula), also a wand of this plant, a casket, in Latr. also as in def. 1.] 1. A part of an early Christian or an Oriental church or basilica, at the end furthest from the bema or sanctuary, and nearest to the main entrance. It was originally separated from the nave merely by a railing or screen; but after the earliest Christian centuries it was generally divided from the church proper by a complete wall, in which were the main entrance-doors to the church, the narthex thus forming a capacious and lofty vestibule of the full width of the church. In primitive times the narthex was the part of the church to which the catechumens, the excommunicated, and the class of penitents called audientes or honorati were admitted. Sometimes it was set apart for the women of the congregation. Occasionally it was double, in which case the inner division was called the exonarthex and the outer division the exonarthex. In the church-building of western Europe in certain types of monastic churches, notably in those of the Benedictines and Cistercians, the narthex persisted until the end of the twelfth century, and often formed a very important architectural feature, as in the splendid example in the great abbey church of Vézelay, France. Also called antechurch, antonaire, promos. See diagram under bema. 2. In antiqu., a small box or casket for unguents or perfumes.—3. [cap.] An old genus of umbelliferous plants, now referred to Ferula. See ausfeldia.

narwet, a. and adr. A Middle English form of narwot.

narwhal (nâr'hwâl), n. [Also narwhale, narwal; = E. narwal = G. narwal, < Sw. Dan. narhval = Icel. nârhwál, a narwhal; the Icel. form is appar. lit. 'a corpse-whale'; < nâr (nom.), in comp. nâr-, a corpse, & hwál = E. whale, and is usually supposed to be so called from its pale color; but the term seems unusual, and the form does not suit the Sw. Dan. narhval. The name may be a native (Greenlandic) form adapted to Icel.; cf. Greenland anarnak, a kind of whale. Cf. walrus, AS. hórswhæl, in which the element whale appears.] A cetacean, Monodon monoceros, of the family Delphinidae and the subfamily Del-

Narwhal (Monodon monoceros)

phapterinae; the sea-unicorn, unicorn-whale, or unicorn-fish. One of the teeth of the male is enormously developed into a straight spirally fluted tusk from 6 to 10 feet long. This tusk is sometimes almost as long as the rest of the creature, and furnishes a valuable ivory. The narwhal also yields a superior quality of oil. It inhabits arctic seas. See also cut under Monodon.

nary (nâr'i), a. [Also nary, and formerly narry, narrow; cf. arg. formerly also erg, arag, arroc.] A corruption of ne'er a, never a (the article being sometimes erroneously repeated after the word in which it is contained).

I warrant me, there is narry a one of all these officer fellows but looks upon himself to be as good as arrow a square of wool, a year. Fielding, Tom Jones, viii. 2.

As for master and the young squire, they have as yet had narry glimpse of the new light.

Snodgrass, Humphrey Clinker, W. Jenkins to Mrs. Mary Jones, p. 180.

nas, a. An obsolete contraction of ne was, was not.

nas, a. An obsolete contraction of ne has, has not.

nasal (nâ'zal), a. and n. [As a noun, in def. 1, ME. nasell, < OE. nasal, nasel, nazel, a part of the helmet which protected the nose; in other senses modern, < P. nasal = Sp. Pg. nasal = It. nasale, < NL. nasalis, of the nose, < L. nasus = E. nose; see nose.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the nose or nostrils; nasal; rhinal.

—2. Uttered with resonance in the nose, or with admission of the expelled air into the nasal passages, by relaxation or dropping of the palatal veil that shuts them off from the pharynx. A nasal sound uttered with complete closure of the mouth-organs is a nasal stop, or check, or mute, or oftenest called a nasal merely, such in English are n, m, ng, uttered respectively in the mouth-positions of d, b, g. There are apt to be in any language as many such as there are positions of mute closure; thus, in Sanskrit there are five. A nasal uttered in a vowel-position of the mouth-organs is a nasal vowel, such are the French an, on, in, un, the Portuguese ão, etc. Nasal semivowels are also possible. And sometimes the whole utterance is rendered more or less nasal (the "nasal twang") by habitual relaxation of the velar closure.

3. In entom., pertaining to the nasus or clypeus. — Nasal bone, a nasal. See 11., 3. — Nasal canal, crest, duct. See the nasus. — Nasal fossa. (a) In anat., the nasal passages, the hollow interior cavity of the nose. In man the nasal fossae are right and left, separated by the nasal septum, and each is subdivided into three fossae or meatus, superior, middle, and inferior. (b) In ornith., the depression upon the bill of a bird in which the external nostrils open. Those are usually well-marked fossae at or near the base of the bill, on either side of the culmen, naked or filled in with feathers, or arched over by an operculum or nasal scale; their characters are often of zoological importance. See cuts and diagram under bill. — Nasal helmet, the helmet of the early middle ages to which a nasal was attached. See 11., 1. — Nasal index. See craniometry. — Nasal meatus. See meatus. — Nasal plate, in herpet., one of the special plates of the head of a reptile through or between which the nostrils open; a nasal. — Nasal point, in craniom., the nasion. — Nasal scale, in ornith., the horny operculum of a bird's nostril; a rhinotheca. — Nasal septum, the partition between the right and left nasal fossae, in man complete and consisting of the perpendicular plate of the ethmoid bone or vomer, the vomer, and a large cartilage called transverse. — Nasal spine, a spinous process of bone of the nose. Three such are named in man: (a) frontal, a process of the frontal bone in part supporting the two nasal bones; (b) anterior, a median process of each maxillary bone, together forming one spine which projects at the base of the outer nostrils or alar nares; (c) posterior, a corresponding median process of the combined palatal bones in the floor of the posterior nares, at the roof of the vula. The last two processes are sometimes called premaxillary and postmaxillary. The anterior process has some ethnological significance, being best developed in the higher races of men, and is also one of several datum points in craniometry. — Nasal suture, in entom., the impressed line dividing the clypeus from the front, same as clypeal suture (which see, under clypeus). — Nasal tube, in ornith., a tubular mark on or rhinotheca, such as occurs in the petrel family and some of the goat suckers.

II. n. 1. A part of a helmet which protects the nose and adjacent parts of the face. It was made in various forms. Also called nose-piece. See also cut under helmet.

Nevertheless he caught him upon the helmet, and kute of the nasell. Malton (L. E. T. S.), iii. 629.

2. A sound uttered through or partly through the nose; especially, a nasal mute or stop, as m, n, ng.—3. In anat., one of the nasal bones. In the higher vertebrates, they are a pair of bones of the surface of the skull, in relation with the frontal, lacrymal, or maxillary bones, covering in more or less of the nasal cavity. They are very variable in shape in different animals, less so in position and relation. In man they form the bridge of the nose. In the osseous fishes different bones have been identified as representatives of the nasals. According to Cuvier, they are a pair of separated small tubiform bones in front of the frontals, called by others tubercula. According to Owen, they are represented by an unpaired projecting bone in front of the frontals, more generally considered to be the ethmoid. The nasals were regarded by Owen as forming the neural spine of the foremost, rhinocephalic, or nasal vertebra. See cuts under craniology, Cratichia, Lophoceros, Antelope, and holothuridae.

4. In herpet., a nasal plate or shield.

Nasalis (nâ'si'lis), n. [NL. < L. nasus = E. nose; see nose.] A remarkable genus of semnopithecine monkeys, containing the proboscis-monkey of Borneo, Semnopithecus nasalis or Nasalis larvatus. Geoffroy St. Hilaire. See cut in next column.

Nasalis larvatus (proboscis-monkey). The act of nasalizing or uttering with a nasal sound.

Kahau, or Proboscis-monkey (Nasalis larvatus).

nasality (nâ-zal'i-ti), n. [nasal + -ity.] The state or quality of being nasal.

The Indian sound differs only in the greater nasality of the first letter. Sir W. Jones, Orthog. of Asiatick Words.

nasalization (nâ'zal-i-zâ'shon), n. [nasalize + -ation.] The act of nasalizing or uttering with a nasal sound.

nasalize (nâ'zal-iz), v.; pret. and pp. nasalized, pp. nasalizing. [nasal + -ize.] 1. trans. To render nasal, as the sound of a letter or syllable by modification or addition.

II. intrans. To speak or pronounce with a nasal sound; speak through the nose.

nasally (nâ'zal-i), adv. In a nasal manner; by or through the nose.

nasard (naz'ârd), n. [= Sp. nasardo, < P. nasard, an organ-stop (cf. OE. nasart, nasart, part of the helmet which protected the nose; same as nasal, n., 1), < L. nasus = E. nose.] In organ-building, a mutation-stop, usually similar to the twelfth. Also nasarde, and corruptly nasart, nasard, nasard, nasard.

nasardly (naz'ârd-li), a. [nasard, appar. < OE. nasarde, a flout, mock, a rap on the nose, < L. nasus (F. nez), nose; see nose. Cf. nasard.] Mean; foolish. Darwin.

What's such a nasardly Pigwiggan?

Colton, Burlesque upon Burlesque.

nasimalar (ná-si-má-lar), a. Same as nasomalar.

nasio-alveolar (ná'si-ál-vé-ól-lar), a. [< nasion + alveolus + -ar] Pertaining to the nasion and the alveolar point; as, the nasio-alveolar distance.

nasio-bregmatic (ná'si-ál-breg-mat'ik), a. [< nasion + bregma(-t) + -ic] Pertaining to the nasion and the bregma, as the arch of the cranium between these points.

nasio-mental (ná'si-ál-men'tal), a. [< nasion + mentum + -al] Pertaining to the nasion and the mentum; as, the nasio-mental length (the distance between these points).

nasion (ná'si-on), n. [NL., < L. nasus = E. nose] In craniom., the median point of the nasofrontal suture. See craniometry.

Nasiterna (nas-i-tér-ná), n. [NL., < L. nasiterna, nasiterna, a watering pot with a large nose or spout, < nasus = E. nose] A genus of Psittacidae; the pygmy parrots. They are the smallest birds of the order, with unornate tail feathers, and of a green color varied with other hues. N. pygmaea and N. pusilla are examples.

naski, n. [Origin obscure.] A prison. Halliwell. [Old cant.]

nasky (nas'ki), a. [Not found in ME.; < Sw. dial. naskig, nasty, dirty; cf. Lat. nescire, also unmask (with neg. un-, here intensive), nasty; Norw. nask, greedy; orig. appar. with initial s as in Sw. dial. snaskig, Sw. snaskig, nasty, snask, dirt; cf. Sw. snaska = Dan. snaske, eat like a pig; cf. also Norw. naska, chaup; other connections uncertain. Not connected with nash. Hence, by variation, nasty, q. v.] Nasty. Catpurr.

Nasmyth hammer. See hammer.

Nasmyth's membrane. See membrane.

nasal-alveolar (ná-zó-ál-vé-ól-lar), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + NL. alveolus + -ar] Pertaining to the nasal and alveolar points; as, the nasal-alveolar line. See craniometry.

nasobasal (ná-zó-bá-sál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + Gr. básis, base; see basal] Pertaining to the nose and the base of the skull; as, the nasobasal angle of Wileker. See craniometry.

nasobasilar (ná-zó-bá-si-lar), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + E. basilar] Pertaining to the nasal point and the basion; as, the nasobasilar line. See craniometry.

nasocular (ná-zók'ú-lar), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + oculus, eye; see ocular] Of or pertaining to the nose and the eye; nasorbital; as, the nasocular or lacrimal duct.

nasio-ethmoidal (ná-zó-éth-mé-dál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + E. ethmoidal] Of or pertaining to the nasal and ethmoidal regions of the skull.

nasofrontal (ná-zó-frón'tál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + frons (front-), forehead; see frontal] Of or pertaining to the nasal bone and the frontal bone; as, the nasofrontal suture.

nasolabial (ná-zó-lá-bi-ál), a. and n. [Also, more prop., nasilabial; < L. nasus = E. nose, + labium, lip; see labial] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the nose and the upper lip. 2. n. A nasolabial muscle.

nasolabialis (ná-zó-lá-bi-á-lis), n. pl. [Also, Nasolabialis] 1. In human nasal, a small muscle connecting the upper lip with the septum of the nose, being one of a pair of muscular slips given off from the orbicularis oris. The interval between them corresponds to the vertical depression seen on the surface between the nose and the lip. Also called nasalis labii superioris, depressor superius, nasalis maxillaris, and depressor apicis maxillaris. E. Wilson.

2. The proper lifter of the nostril and upper lip, usually called levator labii superioris alarque nasi. Cornes and Skute. Also nasilabialis. See first cut under muscle.

nasolacrimal (ná-zó-lák'ri-mál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + lacryma, tear; see lacrymal] Pertaining to the nose and to tears; as, the nasolacrimal duct, which carries tears from the eye to the nose.

nasology (ná-zól'ó-jí), n. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + Gr. -logia, < logos, speak; see -ology] The study of the nose or of noses.

Mr. Dickens is as deep in nasology as the learned Slav. Kennerly.

E. Phillips, Essays from The Times, II. 336. (Parasit.)

nasomalar (ná-zó-má-lar), a. [Also nasomalar; < L. nasus = E. nose, + NL. mala, the cheek; see malar] Of or pertaining to the nose and the cheek or cheek-bone.

nasomaxillary (ná-zó-mák'si-lá-ri), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + maxilla, the jaw-bone; see maxillary] Of or pertaining to the nasal bone and the upper jaw-bone; as, the nasomaxillary suture.

Nason flute. See flute.

nasopalatal (ná-zó-pál'á-tál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + palatum, the palate; see palatal] Same as nasopalatine.

nasopalatine (ná-zó-pál'á-tin), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + palatum, the palate, + -ine; see palatine] Of or pertaining to the nose and to the palate or palate-bone; nasopalatal. - Nasopalatine canal or foramen, one of the anterior palatine canals or foramina, for the transmission of a nasopalatine nerve from the nose to the mouth. - Nasopalatine nerve, a branch of Meckel's ganglion which ramifies in the mucous membrane of the nose and mouth. Also called nerve of Scarpa, nerve of Cottonius, and internal sphenopalatine nerve.

nasopharyngeal (ná-zó-fá-rín'jé-ál), a. [< nasopharynx (-pharynx-) + -al] Pertaining to the nasal fossae and the pharynx.

nasopharynx (ná-zó-fá-rín'jé), n. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + NL. pharynx, q. v.] That part of the pharynx which is behind and above the soft palate, directly continuous with the nasal passages; distinguished from oropharynx.

nasorbital (ná-zór'bi-tál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + orbita, orbit; see orbital] Of or pertaining to the nose and the orbits of the eyes; orbitonasal; nasocular.

nasosubnasal (ná-zó-súb-ná-sál), a. [< L. nasus = E. nose, + sub, under, + nasus = E. nose; see nasal] Connecting the nasal and the subnasal point. See craniometry.

Nassa (nas'á), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < L. nassa, nassa, a wicker basket with a narrow neck for catching fish, a weed.] The leading genus of Nassidae. Some of the species are known as dog-whelks. Several abound on the Atlantic coast of the United States, as N. obsoleta and N. trisulcata.

Nassau grouper. A West Indian fish; same as hamlet.

Nassellaria (nas-el-á-ri-á), n. pl. [NL., < nassella, dim. of L. nassa, a wicker basket; see Nassidæ, + -aria] Haeckel's name of radiolarians with the central capsule originally invariably uniaxial, oval, or conical, with two different poles of the axis, having at one pole the characteristic porous area through which the whole of the pseudopodia project like a bush.

nassa-fish (nas'á-fish), n. The angler, Lophius piscatorius.

Nassidæ (nas'í-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Nassa + -idæ] A family of bivalve-like or wheel-like gastropods, typified by the genus Nassa; the dog-whelks. The animal has a large foot generally bled behind, a long siphon, and a radula with the numerous teeth multidentate, and the lateral ones generally armed with intermediate denticles. The operculum is muscular and usually serrate. The shell is generally small, compact, and highly sculptured, with a twisted or plaited columella, and usually a callosal or columellar line. The species are numerous and occur in all seas. See first cut under dog-whelk.

Nassine (nas-sí-né), n. pl. [NL., < Nassa + -ine] The Nassidæ considered as a subfamily of Buccinidae; the dog-whelks.

nast (nást), n. [< nasty] Dirt; nastiness. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] nast². An obsolete contraction of ne hast, hast not.

nasten (nás'tán), v. t. [< nast¹ + -en] To render nasty. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] nastily (nás'ti-lí), adv. In a nasty manner; filthily; dirtily; disagreeably; unpleasantly.

nastiness (nás'ti-nés), n. 1. The character of being filthy; filthiness; dirtiness; filthy habits or condition.

The nastiness of the beastly multitude. Sir J. Haycraft.

2. Disgusting taste; nauseousness.

That quality of unmitigated nastiness which so familiarly attests the goodness of our Western dogs. The Atlantic, XXI. 336.

3. Disagreeableness; unpleasantness; as, the general nastiness of the weather. [Colloq., chiefly in Great Britain.] -- 4. Meanness; dishonorableness; as, the nastiness of the trick. [Colloq.] -- 5. That which is filthy; filth.

The swine is as filthy when he lies close in his sty as when he comes forth and shakes his nastiness in the street. South, Sermons, VIII. 1.

6. Moral filth or filthiness; grossness or indecency; obscenity.

The common quality, however, of all Dryden's comedies is their nastiness, the more remarkable because we have ample evidence that he was a man of modest conversation. Lowell, Among my books, 1st ser., p. 65.

= Syn. Foulness, defilement, pollution.

nasturtium (nas-tér'shon), n. See nasturtium. 2. Nasturtium (nas-tér'shi-um), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1812), < L. nasturtium, a cross, with ref. to its somewhat acrid smell, < L. natus, = E. nose, + torquere, pp. torus, twist; see tort] 1. A genus of plants of the order Cruciferae and the tribe Arabideæ, known by the pod with seeds in two rows and turgid valves. There are about 20 species, branching herbs, in water or on land, usually with small white flowers, pinately divided leaves, and pods short or elongated. They bear the general name of water-cress.

Flowering plant of Nasturtium officinale. A flower, 2, pod.

but N. officinale is the water-cress proper, a creeping herb of springs and brooks, much cultivated, a native of Europe and temperate Asia, naturalized in America and elsewhere, particularly in New Zealand, where it is said to grow so luxuriantly as to choke up rivers. Other species, as the wide-spreading N. palustre, the marsh-cress, are woody, looking plants of little consequence.

2. [l. c.] One of various species of the genus Tropaeolum. The most common is T. majus, the Indian cross or lack's head, a showy climber, the large flowers varying from orange to scarlet and crimson. A smaller sort with pale flowers is T. minus. A third kind is the tuberosous nasturtium, T. tuberosum. These plants are considered antiscorbutic; the fruits are pickled and used in the place of capers, and the leaves and flowers serve for a salad.

3. [l. c.] A rich orange color. See capucine.

Nastus (nas'tus), n. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1799), so called as having the stem not hollow, but filled with pith; < Gr. nastic, filled, solid] A genus of tall grasses of the tribe Hambuseæ, known by the numerous empty glumes, the grain adnate to the pericarp. There are 2 or 3 species, natives of the Mascarene Islands, of tree-like habit, with leaves like those of the bamboo, and one-flowered spikelets in panicles. N. Borbonicus of the Isle of Bourbon (or Island Bourbon) forms a belt entirely around the mountain of the island. It is a fine species, reaching a height of 30 feet.

nasty (nás'tí), a. [A var. of the earlier nasky.] 1. Filthy; dirty; foul; unclean, either literally or figuratively. (a) Physically filthy or dirty.

Honeying and making love over the nasty city. Black, Hamlet, III. 4. 64.

I am a nasty heap than those, and may Taint thy sweet Lustre by my filth's excess.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, II. 135.
A people breaths not more savage and nasty; crusted with dirt.
Sandys, Traveller, p. 86.

(b) Of filthy habits

Therefore the Lord, this Day, with loathsome filth
Plagues poor and rich, the nasty and the nice,
Both Man and beast.
Spenser, II. of the Barons' Wars, II. The Laws.

This day our captain told me that our landmen were very nasty and slovenly, and that the gun-deck, where they lodged, was so beastly and noisome with their victuals and beastliness as would much endanger the health of the ship.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, p. 12.

(c) Morally filthy; indecent; (d) Indelicate applied to speech or behavior.

Sir Thomas More, in his answer to Luther, has thrown out the greatest heap of nasty language that perhaps ever was put together.
Rp. Atterbury.

2. Nauseous; disgusting to taste or smell: as, a nasty medicine.—3. In a weakened sense, disagreeable; bad. [Colloq., Eng.]

Lady A. — said here (in England) at a dinner, . . .
speaking to her husband, . . . who thought it proper not to touch his soup. Do take some, A. — It's not at all nasty.
R. G. White, England Without and Within, xvi.

4. Foul; stormy; disagreeable; unpleasant; applied to the weather. Compare dirty and foul in the same sense. [Colloq., Eng.]

A stormy day is called in England a nasty day.
R. G. White, England Without and Within, xvi.

5. Troublesome; annoying; difficult to deal with, or threatening trouble; of a kind to be avoided: as, a nasty customer to deal with; a nasty cut or fall.—6. Ill-mannered; mean; dishonorable; hateful: as, a nasty remark; a nasty trick. [Colloq.]

She is a nasty, hardened creature; and I do hate her.
. . . How a woman can be so nasty I can't imagine.
Trolope, Is he Popenjoy? lix.

—Syn. 1 and 3. Nasty, Filthy, Foul, Dirty. These words are on the descending scale of strength. Nasty is the strongest word in the language for that which is offensive to sight, smell, or touch by the quality of its uncleanness or uncleanliness. The English fondness for the colloquial use of the word in connection with bad weather, and figuratively for anything disagreeable, is not matched by anything in America, on the contrary, the word is considered too strong for ordinary or delicate use, and foul is used of bad weather. All the words apply to that which is filled or covered in considerable degree with anything offensive. The moral uses of the word correspond with the physical.

nasty-man (näs'ti-man), n. See garroting.

Nasua (näs'sü-i), n. [NL., < L. nasua = E. nose; see nose.] The only genus of conimondids, of the subfamily Nasutinae. Several described species are reducible to two, N. nasua and N. rufa. The genus was founded by Storr, 1780. See cut under cutt.

Nasutinae (näs-sü-ti-nö), n. pl. [NL., < Nasua
+ -inae.] A subfamily of the racoon family, Procyonidae, typified by the genus Nasua; the conimondids or conitis. They have an extremely long snout, with corresponding modification of the cranial bones; the auditory bulla is small and flattened, and the mustoid extremity. See cut under cutt.

nasuline (näs'sü-i-n), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Nasutinae. II. n. A member of the Nasutinae; a coniti.

alis, of birth: see natal¹.] Same as natalitial.

natality (nä'täl'i-ti), n. [— F. natalité, < L. na- talis, of birth: see natal¹.] 1†. Birth.

I should doubt whether Samuel Foote visited Truro more than once since the natality of Mr. Polwhele was proclaimed to his kindred.
Jon Bee, Essay on Samuel Foote, p. lxxvii.

2. The ratio of the number of births in a given time, as a year, to the total-number of population; birth rate.

The European defective classes, whose natality and infantile death rates are enormous, are forcibly exported in great numbers to this country. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 100.

nataloin (nä'täl'ö-in), n. [< Natal (see def.) +
-oin.] A bitter principle contained in Natal or Cape aloes. See aloin.

Natalus (nä'täl'üs), n. [NL.] A genus of tropical American bats of the family Vespertilionidae and subfamily Miniopterinæ, having 2 incisors and 3 premolars in each upper half-jaw and 3 incisors and 3 premolars in each lower half-jaw, and a short conical fragus. N. stramineus is an example.

natant (nä'tant), a. [< L. natant (t-ns), ppr. of natant (> It. natant = Sp. Pg. nadar = OF. nater, naer), swim, freq. of nare,

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 226.

5. Nationalism; devotion or strong attachment to one's own nation or country.

In antiquity they [the Jews] developed an intense sentiment of nationality.
J. Pake, Idea of God, p. 72.

nationalization (nash'ōn-al-ē-zā'shōn), n. [< national + -ation.] 1. The act of rendering national in character instead of local.

Calhoun's letter to Pickens was the official proclamation of the nationalization of slavery, only, however, so far as it imposed duties upon the Union, but by no means with regard to any corresponding rights.
H. von Holst, John C. Calhoun (trans.), p. 238.

2. The act of making national as regards possession, use, and control; especially, as advocated by many socialists, the abolition of private property, as in lands, railways, etc., and the vesting of it in the nation for national use; as, the nationalization of land.

Without compensation, nationalization of the land is flagrantly unjust and quite hopeless, with compensation, its benefits are remote and doubtful.
O'Brien, Tr. of Lavelley's Socialism, p. 302.

Nationalization of the land makes its appearance in the list of many a London Working Men's Club. Nationalization of ordinary capital and state regulation of wages appear hardly less frequently.
Contemporary Rev., LIII. 140.

Also spelled nationalism.

O'Curry, Anc. Irish, II, xxxviii.

Bayard Taylor always considered himself native to the East, and it was with great delight that in 1851 he found himself on the banks of the Nile. Evening Post, XVII, 91.

[With reference to names or other words, native is especially used to designate a name or word indigenous in a country or among a people beyond the ordinary pale of Anglo-Saxon or European civilization; thus, the native products and customs of the barbarous tribes of Africa or Australia or of the imperfectly civilized peoples of India, Arabia, etc., have "native names" which are commonly so referred to when it is inconvenient or impossible to give a precise designation of the language, or etymological history of the word, concerned. In this dictionary, in the etymological column, "native name" means a name used and usually originating in the country or among the people indicated in the definition or otherwise.]

5. Connected by birth; hence, closely related; near.

To join like likes and kiss like native things.

Shak., All's Well, I, 1, 238.

I owe nothing in you more than your innocence, you retain so native a simplicity.

R. Johnson, Cynthia's Revels, v, 2.

High minds, of native pride and force,
Most deeply feel thy pangs, Remorse!

Scott, Marmion, III, 18.

It is not what a poet takes, but what he makes out of what he has taken, that shows what native force is in him.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 154.

8. Occurring in nature pure or uncombined with other substances; said of mineral products, and especially of the metals: as, native mercury; native copper; also used to describe any mineral occurring in nature in distinction from the corresponding substance formed artificially: as, galena occurs native and also as a furnace product. — Native American party. See American. — Native bear, native sloth. Same as hoka. — Native bread, a fungus, Mytilus Australis, used by the natives of Australia as a sort of bread. It is often several inches in diameter, and when dry looks like a hard, compact lump of sugar. — Native cat, the spotted cat of Australia. — Native cinnamon, cod, devil, mercury, trooper, etc. See the nouns. — Native companion, the large gray cinnam of Australia. — Fig. 7. Natua, Nature, Natural. Natua has the narrow meaning of belonging to the event of one's birth, hence it is chiefly used with such words as day, hour, star. Nature means conferred by birth: as, native genius; or, belonging by birth or origin: as, native place, country, language. Natural applies to that which is by nature, as opposed to the work of art. Nature is opposed to that which is acquired, natural is opposed to that which is elaborated by rules. — 4. Indigena, etc. See original.

II. n. 1. One born in a certain place or country, a person or thing which derives its origin from a specified place or country.

Well hast thou known proud Troy's perfidious land,
And well her natives' moil at thy hand!

Pope, Iliad, VI, 70.

That shadowy realm where hope is a native.

H. G. Mitchell, Reveries of a Bachelor.

[Any person born in a given country is a native of it; but the term, with reference to a country, is naturally most used by foreigners, to whom as discoverers, explorers, travelers, writers, etc., "the natives" are the aboriginal inhabitants, until in the progress of settlement and colonization the native-born colonists claim or receive the name of "native" also.]

2. In feudal times, one born a serf or villein, as distinguished from a person who had become so in any other way.

So that neither we nor our successors for the future shall be able to claim any right in the aforesaid (native) on account of his nativity, i. e., being in the condition of a native, or slave, or Whalley, saying to us our right and challenge with respect to any others our natives.
St. Gregory de Nyssa, Abbot of Whalley, who died in 1290, quoted in Baker's Hist. Lancashire, II, 9, note.

By acts of emancipation or manumission the native was made a freeman, even though with the disabilities he lost the privilege of maintenance which he could claim on the land of his lord.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 405.

3. In astrology, a person born under that aspect of the stars which is under consideration.

The length of time in which the apheta and anaretia, as posited in each respective figure of a nativity, will be in forming a conjunction or coming together in the same point of the heavens, is the precise length of the native's life.

Sidley, Astrology, p. 404.

Fillmore was in Europe when he was chosen by the Nativists of Philadelphia as their standard-bearer.

H. von Holst, Const. Hist. (trans.), V, 402.

nativistic (nā'tiv-ist-ik), a. [< nativist + -ic.] In philos., of or pertaining to nativism or the nativists.

Thus the nativistic school of explanation is replaced by the "empiricist" school, as Helmholtz calls it.

Science, VI, 309.

nativity (nā'tiv-'i-ti), n.; pl. nativities (-tiz). [< ME. nativita, < OF. nativete, F. nativité, also naveté (see naveté, naïvreté), = Sp. natividad = Pg. natividade = It. natività, < L. nativitas (-is), birth, < natus, born; see native.] 1. The fact of being born; birth.

At thy nativity, a glorious quire
Of angels, in the fields of Bethlehem, sung
To shepherds, watching at their folds by night.

Milton, P. R., I, 1, 242.

Christmas has come once more — the day devoted by the large majority of Christians to the commemoration of the Nativity of the Saviour. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 215.

2. The circumstances attending birth, as time, place, and surroundings.

They say there is divinity in odd numbers, either in nativity, chance, or death.

Shak., St. W., v, 1, 4.

A Prince born for the good of Christendom, if a Ray in his Nativity had not hindered it.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 67.

3. In particular, the birth of Christ; hence, (a) the festival commemorating the birth of Christ; Christmas; (b) a picture representing the birth of Christ; as, the Nativity of Perugia in the hall of the Cambio at Perugia. — 4. In feudal times, the condition of servitude or villeinage. See native, n., 2.

The different ranks of the bondmen or unfree class (in Scotland) have been preserved in the code of laws termed "quintan attachments." They are there termed native men (nativi), and we are told that there are several kinds of nativity or bondage (nativitas sive bondagii). Quoted in Kilbuck-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 334.

5. In astrology, a scheme or figure of the heavens, particularly of the twelve houses, at the moment when a person was born; a horoscope.

As men which judge nativities consider not single stars, but the aspects, the concurrence and posture of them, so in this, though no particular past arrest me or divert me, yet all seems remarkable and enormous.

Deane, Letters, cxxiv.

Domicile of nativity. See domicile, 2. Feast of the Nativity of Christ, Christmas. — Nativity of a saint, in titles of church festivals, the day of a saint's physical death, regarded as his birth into a higher life. In the case of the Virgin Mary and St. John Baptist, however, the day of physical birth is meant, as in the Nativity of Christ. — Nativity of St. John Baptist, in the Roman Catholic, the Greek, and the Anglican Church, a festival observed on June 24th, in honor of the birth of St. John the Baptist. — Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the Roman Catholic and in the Greek Church, and also in the Anglican Calendar, a festival observed on September 8th, in commemoration of the birth of the Virgin Mary. — To cast a nativity, in astrology, to draw out a scheme of the heavens at the moment of birth, and calculate according to rules the future influence of certain stars upon the person then born.

nativity-pie (nā'tiv-'i-ti-pi), n. A Christmas pie. Halliwel.

And will drop you forth a libel, or a sanctified lie,
Betwixt every spoonful of a nativity-pie.

B. Jonson, Volpone, I, 1.

nat. phil. An abbreviation of natural philosophy; so used in this work.

Natricidae (nā'tris-'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Natrrix (-is) + -idae.] A family of colubrine snakes, named from the genus Natrrix; now merged in Colubridae.

Natricine (nā'tri-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Natrrix (-is) + -ine.] A subfamily of Colubridae, typified by the genus Natrrix. It includes those having the head distinct, the body and tail moderately elongate, and the teeth ungrooved and not longer in front, as the black snakes of the United States (Natrrix or Scaphis and Bacconia) and numerous others.

natricine (nā'tri-sin), a. Of or pertaining to the Natricine.

Natrrix (nā'triks), n. [NL., < L. natrrix, a water-snake, < natare, swim; see natant.] 1. A genus of colubrine snakes to which various limits have been given. (a) By Laurenti (1768) it was used for a large assemblage now dissociated among many genera. (b) By Merriam it was used for species now combined under the genus Tropidonotus, including the T. natrrix of Europe and allied ones. (c) By Cope it was limited to the genus usually called Scaphis, represented by the giant black-snake of the United States.

2. [i. e.] A snake of this genus.

naturoboracite (nā'trō-bō-rā-'al-ait), n. [< natron + boron + calcite.] Same as slawite.

natrolite (nat'-ro-lit), n. [< natron + Gr. lithos, a stone: see -lith.] A scottish mineral occurring in slender acicular crystals, also in masses with a fibrous and radiating structure, generally of a white color and transparent to translucent. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminum and sodium (whence the name), common in cavities in basalt and other siliceous rocks, less so in granite and gneiss. Also called soda-natrolite and needle-natrolite — Iron natrolite, a dark-green variety of natrolite containing a considerable amount of iron.

natrometer (nā-trom'e-tēr), n. [< natron + Gr. metron, a measure: see meter-1.] An instrument for measuring the quantity of soda contained in salts of potash and soda. E. H. Knight.

natron (nā'tron), n. [= F. Sp. natron, < Ar. natrān, nitran, native carbonate of sodium: see natr, from the same source.] Native carbonate of sodium, or mineral alkali ($\text{Na}_2\text{CO}_3 \cdot 10\text{H}_2\text{O}$). It is found in the ashes of several marine plants, in some lakes, as in those of Egypt, and in some mineral springs.

natr, n. See nat.

natter (nat'er), v. i. [Cf. nattle; cf. also lecl. gnadde, murmur.] To find fault; nag. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

"Ha' a drop o' warm broth?" said Lisbeth, whose natterly feeling now got the better of her nattering habit. George Eliot, Adam Bede, iv.

nattered (nat'er-d), a. [< natter + -ed.] Peevish; querulous; impatient. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

As she said of herself she believed she grew more nattered as she grew older, but that she was conscious of her natteredness was a new thing. Mrs. Gaskell, Ruth, xxii. (Darwin) natteredness (nat'er-d-ness), n. Peevishness; querulousness. See quotation under nattered.

natterjack (nat'er-jak), n. A very common European toad, Bufo calamita, belonging to the family Bufo. Its color is light-yellowish, inclining to brown, and clouded with dull olive, and it has a bright yellow line running along the middle of the back. It does not leap or crawl with the slow pace of a common toad, but its motion is more like running, and it has also the name of walking toad or running toad. It has a deep, hollow voice, which may be heard at a considerable distance.

Natterjack (Bufo calamita)

natterjack-toad (nat'er-jak-tōd), n. Same as natterjack.

nattery (nat'er-i), a. [< natter + -y.] Petty; ill-natured; crabbed. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] nattes (natts), n. pl. [< F. nattie, a piece of nattering or braiding, a tress: see nat.] 1. The French word for nattering or braiding: used in English for such work when of unusual or ornamental character. Hence — 2. Surface-decoration resembling or suggesting intertwined or plaited work.

nattily (nat'i-li), adv. In natty manner; with neatness; sprucely; tidily. [Colloq.]

Sweeting alone received the pony like a smart, sensible little man as he was, putting it gallantly and nattily into his button-hole. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xv.

nattiness (nat'i-ness), n. The quality or state of being natty or neat. [Colloq.]

Everything belonging to Miss Nancy was of delicate purity and nattiness: . . . and as for her own person, it gave the same idea of perfect swaying neatness as the body of a little bird. George Eliot, Silas Marner, vi.

nattering (nat'ing), n. [< nat + -ing. Cf. nattering.] Nattering.

For covering the seats with nattering in the Dean's closet. Public House of York, Gazette, p. 248. (Shope, Dict.) nattle (nat'l), v. i. [pret. and pp. nattered, nattering.] [Origin obscure.] 1. To nibble; munch. [Scotch.] — 2. To be busy about trifles; potter. [Prov. Eng.] — 3. In coal-mining, to make a faint crackling or rustling sound premonitory of a giving way of the rock; fizzle. [Prov. Eng.]

natty (nat'i), a. [*Formerly also natty; a dial. dim. of neat*²: see *neat*², *neat*³.] Neat; tidy; spruce. [Colloq.]

How fine and how natty
Good housewife should jettie
From morning to night
Tusser, Husbandry, p. 130.

A connoisseur might have seen "points" in her which had a higher promise for maturity than Lucy's natty completeness. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, l. 7.

A very natty little officer, whose handsome uniform was a source of great pride and a matter of great care to him. Harper's Mag., LXIX, 319.

natty-boxes (nat'i-bok'sez), n. pl. The contribution paid periodically by the workmen in various branches of trade to the trade-union to which they belong. [Hallied.] [Prov. Eng.] natura (nā-tu'ra), n. [1. < see nature.] Nature; especially, nature personified. Natura naturans, nature regarded as a creative energy, the natural world with respect to its energizing principle. Natura naturata, nature regarded as a result or product of creative energy; the total of sensible objects, the natural world.

naturable (nat'ū-ra-bl), a. [< OF. naturable, as nature + -able.] 1. Natural. — 2. Kind. [Hallied.] natural (nat'y-ral), a. and n. [< ME. natūrl, naturill, < OF. naturel, F. naturel = Sp. Pg. natural = It. naturale, < L. naturalis, by birth, in accordance with nature. < natura, birth, nature: see nature.] 1. a. 1. Being such as one or it is by birth or by nature. (a) Lawfully born; legitimate — opposed to adopted and illegitimate. Then factor afterwards entered again. With the noble men, . . . and his natural brother. Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. 8), l. 644.

Sept. 18, 1641. Grant of tuition, &c., of Anne Lawrence daughter, natural and legitimate daughter of Lawrence Edmundson, late of Maghull, co. Lancaster, deceased, to Thomas Edmundson of Maghull, aforesaid, her uncle. Adm. Act Book, P. C. Chester, quoted in N. and Q., [7th ser.], vi. 1.

(b) By birth merely; not legal; illegitimate; bastard, as, a natural son, a new which dates from the beginning of the seventeenth century.

In England we have unquestioned descendants by natural (i. e., illegitimate) descent of Stuart as well as Plantagenet. N. and Q., 7th ser., vi. 43.

2. Native; native-born; indigenous: as, natural citizens or subjects.

Before all things God commanded that the kings should be natural of the kingdom. That is to understand, that hee should be an Hebrew circumcised, & no Gentile. Gen. xxviii, letters (tr. by Holloway, 1677), p. 8.

Jewish ordinals we had some things natural, and of the perpetuity of these things no man doubteth. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 11.

Beside the natural inhabitants of the aforesaid places, they had, even in those days, traffic with Jews, Turks, and other foreigners. Hakluyt (Arber's Eng. Garner), l. 20.

3. Produced or implanted at birth or when constituted or made; conferred by nature; inherent or innate; not acquired or assumed; as, natural disposition; natural beauty; a natural gait.

A wretch whose natural gifts were poor. Shak., Hamlet, l. 6, 11.

God loving to bless all the means and instruments of his service, whether they be natural or acquired. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II, 250.

Acute has natural good sense, good nature, and discretion, so that every man enjoys himself in his company. Steele, Spectator, No. 286.

4. Born; being such as one or it is from birth.

I saw in Rosetta two of these naked adults, who are commonly natural fools, and are had in great veneration in Egypt. Procure, Description of the East, l. 14.

5. In keeping with or proper to the nature, character, or constitution; belonging to birth or constitution; normal: as, the natural position of the body in sleep; the natural color of the hair; hence, as easy, spontaneous, etc., as if constituting a part of or proceeding from the very nature or constitution: as, oratory was natural to him.

For custom doth imitate nature, and that which is ac- customable, the very same thing is now become natural. Bacon's Book I (F. 1, 3, 5), p. 257.

These clocks throughout the whole world be all of one colour, and that is the natural colour of the wood. Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), II, 4.

A certain continued form and quality, many times natural to the writer many times his peculiar by elation and art. Pattenham, Art of Eng. Poets, p. 123.

Persons in afflictment have carried burdens, and leaped ditches, and climbed walls, which their natural power could never have done.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 281.

Hence — 6. Not strained or affected; without affectation, artificiality, or exaggeration; easy; unaffected: applied to persons or to their conduct or manners, etc.

On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting. 'Twas only that when he was off he was acting. Oldmixon, Reformation.

With respect to the exercise of the pathetic judgment, children should be encouraged to be natural, and to pronounce opinion for themselves. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 442.

7. Obedient to the better impulses of one's nature; affectionate; kindly.

Was this a natural mother, was this naturally done, to publish the sin of her own son? Latimer, Sermon bet. Edw. VI., 1580.

No child can be too natural to his parent. B. Jonson, Catiline, III, 2.

8. In a state of nature; unregenerate; carnal; physical.

The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God. 1 Cor. ii. 14.

You see, children, what comes o' tollerit' the natural heart: it's deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. She followed her natural heart, and nobody knows where she's gone to. H. R. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 333.

9. Formed, produced, or brought about by nature, or by the operations of the laws of nature; real; not artificial or cultivated: as, natural scenery; a natural bridge.

This rock is famous for a natural tunnel, passing directly through its heart. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 376.

Confine our attention, in the first place, to natural meadow grass, let us glance at the process (of hay-making). Encyc. Brit., l. 879.

A good deal of the beauty of natural objects turns on association. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 433.

10. Being in conformity with the laws of nature; happening in the ordinary course of things, without the intervention of accident or violence; regulated or determined by the laws which govern events, actions, etc.: as, natural consequences; a natural death.

To have and enjoy the said office of Governour, to him the said Sebastian Calisto during his natural life, without amending or diminishing from the same room. Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 209.

There is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out. Shak., Hamlet, II, 2, 383.

It would seem natural that we should first of all have asked the question how the more understanding could arrive at all this knowledge a priori, and what extent, what truth, and what value it could possess. If we take natural to mean what is just and reasonable, then nothing could be more natural. But if we understand by natural what takes place ordinarily, then, on the contrary, nothing is more natural and more intelligible than that this examination should have been neglected for so long a time. Kant, tr. by Max Müller.

Saving men from the natural penalties of disquieting, eventually necessitates the infliction of artificial penalties in solitary cells on tread wheels and by the lash. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 13.

11. Of or pertaining to nature; connected with or relating to the existing system of things; treating of or derived from nature as known to man, or the world of matter and mind; belonging to nature: as, natural philosophy or history; natural religion or theology; natural laws.

I call that natural religion which men might know . . . by the mere principles of reason, improved by consideration and experience, without the help of revelation. Sp. Watson.

The study of mental life has led us into paths far removed from those along which the explanation of natural phenomena is wont to move. Lohr, Microcosmus (trans.), l. 267.

12. Same as naturalistic, 3.

It is difficult to give an exact definition or even description of what I have called the natural view of man. Perhaps it may be best defined, negatively, as the view which denies to reason any spontaneous or creative function in the human constitution. W. R. Soren, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 29.

13. In math., having 1 as the base of the system: applied to a function or number belonging or referred to such a system: as, natural numbers (that is, those beginning with 1); natural sines, cosines, etc. (those taken in arcs whose radii are 1). — 14. In music, a term applied either (a) to the distance or normal scale of C two scales; or (b) to an air or modulation of harmony which moves by easy and smooth transitions, changing gradually or but little into nearly related keys; or (c) to music produced by the voice, as distinguished from instrumental music; or (d) to the harmonies or overtones given off by any vibrating body.

over and above its original sound. — Natural act, an act which is connected with its subject by a natural cause. — Natural allegiance. See Allegiance, 1. — Natural astrology. See Astrology. — Natural bait, any article of food proper to a fish, used to induce the fish to take the hook, as distinguished from an artificial bait or imitation of the fish's natural food; sometimes simply called bait, when the artificial article is distinguished as a lure. Among natural baits are many small fishes, as minnows, frogs; certain crustaceans, as crawfish, worms of various kinds, mollusks of various kinds, some insects or their larvae, spawn of various fishes and crustaceans, etc. — Natural being. See Being. — Natural belief, an instinctive, a priori cognition. — Natural body, according to St. Paul's teaching, the physical body in its present visible condition; literally, the psychical body — that is, the body belonging to the soul, as the breath of life — opposed to spiritual body, the body belonging and adapted to the spirit or highest part of man's nature. See soul, psychical, spiritual. — It is known a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body. 1 Cor. xv. 44.

Natural cause, a cause which acts by natural necessity, as opposed to compulsion and to freedom. — Natural child, cognition, etc. See the nouns. — Natural consciousness, the form of consciousness possessed by all men; primary consciousness. — Natural day, a space of twenty-four hours.

In the space of a day natural
This is to say, in four and twenty hours.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 108.

Natural definition, a definition which states the essential parts of the thing defined, as when man is defined as a substance composed of a body and an intellectual soul.

— Natural dualism, finger-breadth, bannel, gas, goodness, etc. See the nouns. — Natural egotistical idealism, the doctrine that the immediate object in perception is a mode of the mind which it is determined to present by its own natural laws. — Natural harmonic, in musical instruments of the viol, lute, or harp families, one of the harmonics or overtones of an open string; opposed to artificial harmonic, which is derived from a stopped string. Also used pneumatically for any harmonic.

— Natural harmony, in music, harmony without modulations or derived chords. — Natural hexachord, in medieval music, the second hexachord (and also the fifth): so called because it began on C, the key-note of the "natural" key. See key. — Natural history, immutability, infirmity. See the nouns. — Natural infancy, a phrase sometimes used by law-writers to designate infancy under the age of seven years, as being a period of natural and complete incapacity in a legal sense. — Natural intervals. See interval. — Natural key. See key. — Natural law, the expression of right reason or the dictate of religion, influencing in nature and man, and having ethically a binding force as a rule of civil conduct, the will of man's Maker. — Blackstone. See law of nature, under nature.

— Natural liberty. See liberty. — Natural line of sight. See sight. — Natural logarithm. See logarithm. — Natural logic, love, maglo, magnet, man, marmalade, method, motion. See the nouns. — Natural modulation, in music, a modulation of one and direct character, as from a given key (tonality) to one of its near relatives.

— Natural necessity, necessity which springs from within, from an internal principle of development, not from outward compulsion. — Natural obligation, an expression used in the civil law, in two different cases: (a) Where two different persons, though no agreement express or implied had been made, came into such a relation that the prior was induced to impute to it some of the legal characteristics of an obligation, for example, the act of becoming jointly enriched at another person's expense. (b) Where an obligation was imperfect, so that no action could be maintained on it, and yet certain legal effects, which were not the same in all cases, were attributed to it by law. The equivalent English phrase is imperfect obligation. — Natural order, in bot., an order belonging to the natural system of classification. In contradistinction to one of an artificial system devised for the more convenience of a student. In this system all the organs must be taken into consideration, and the affinity of any two or more plants will be determined by their agreement or disagreement first in the more important organs and then in the less important. — Natural perfection, a perfection due to natural causes, or belonging to nature. — Natural persons. See person. — Natural philosophy, originally, the study of nature in general; now, more commonly, the branch of physical science which treats of those properties and phenomena of bodies which are unaccompanied by an essential change in the bodies themselves. It thus includes the various sciences classed under physics. See physics. Abbreviated nat. phil. — Natural pitch, the pitch of a wind instrument, especially of an organ-pipe, when not overblown. — Natural price, printing, etc. See the nouns. — Natural propensity or *appetite, a congenital or innate one, although it may not be actually developed until later in life. — Natural realism, the doctrine that the immediate object of perception is the real external object or thing. — Natural rights. See right. — Natural scale. See natural key, under key. — Natural science, a phrase employed in much the same signification as natural history in its widest sense, and used in contradistinction to mental, moral, or mathematical science. — Natural selection, theology, etc. See the nouns. — Natural sign, a sign which stands for its object independently of any human convention. Natural signs are either formal, standing for their objects in virtue of an bling them, or matters of, standing for their objects by virtue of some natural connection or real relation with them, as a weathercock to the wind. The former are called icons, the latter indices. The distinction seems to have originated with Euclid Venetus. — Natural system, in bot. See Jussieu, and natural order, above. — Natural whole, in bot., a whole determined by the logical comprehension, either an essential or a mathematical whole. — Syn. 1, 2, and 4. Nat., etc. See nature.*

II. n. 14. That which is natural to one; natural quality, disposition, or expression.

That is, when he (our country poet) is most artificial, so to disguise and cloak it as it may not appear nor seem to proceed from him by any study or trade of rules, but to be his natural.

Pultenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 282.
It is with depraved man, in his impure natural, that we must maintain this quarrel. Sp. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

And yet this much his course do approve,
He was not bloody in his natural.
Daniel, Civil Wars, lv. 42. (Nares.)

24. A natural gift or endowment.

But how out of purpose and place do I name art? When the professors are grown so absolute contenters of it, and presumers on their own natural, as they are deriders of all diligence that way. H. Jonson, Alchemist, To the Reader.

3. One born without the usual faculty of reasoning or understanding; a fool; an idiot.

This drivelling love is like a great natural, that runs lolling up and down to hide his bauble in a hole.

Shak., R. and J., II. 4. 86.

I own the Man is not a Natural; he has a very quick sense, tho' very slow understanding.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, II. 1.

44. A native; an original inhabitant.

The more severe that these are to the natural, the greater their repute with the Spaniards, who enrich themselves by extorting from the other.

Sandys, Travels, p. 202.

54. A production of nature.

The object naturalis have their specificall properties, and some wondrous virtues, and philosophy will not flatter the noblest or worstest natural in their venous or impurities.

Harsely, Pierce's Supererogation.

6. An oyster of natural wild growth, not planted. [New Jersey.] — 7. In music: (a) On the keyboard, a white key (digital) as distinguished from a black key. (b) In notation, the sign ♮, placed before a note to counteract the effect of a sharp or flat in the signature or previously introduced as an accidental. Natural is not used in signature except where a change of key takes place and one or more of the sharps or flats of the original signature are to be annulled. Also called a cancel. See accidental, n., and signature. (c) A note affected by a ♮, or a tone thus represented. — 8. A kind of wig worn in England early in the eighteenth century.

In 1734 the peruke-makers advertised "full bottom toes, full bows, minister's bows, natural, half natural, Grecian flies, curly rows, curly levants, quills, quene's perukes, and huge wigs" among the variety of artificial head-gear which they supplied.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 509.

natural-born (nat'ū-rāl-bōrn), a. 1. Native in a country; not alien.

Natural-born subjects are such as are born within the dominions of the crown of England, that is, within the allegiance, or as it is generally called, the allegiance of the king.

No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president.

Constitution of the United States, art. II. § 1.

2. So by nature; born so: as, a natural-born fool.

naturalia (nat-u-rā'li-ā), n. pl. [Nat., neut. pl. of L. naturalis, natural; see natural.] The sexual organs.

naturalisation, naturalise. See naturalization, naturalize.

naturalism (nat'ū-rāl-izm), n. [= F. naturalisme = Sp. naturalismo; as natural + -ism.] 1. A state of nature; uncivilized or unregenerate condition.

Those spirited and wanton cross-worms, as they call themselves, who are striving with speed and alacrity to come up to the naturalism and lawless privileges of the first class.

Sp. Lavington, Moravian Compared and Detected, p. 68. (Latham.)

2. Conformity to nature or to reality; a close adherence to nature in the arts of painting, sculpture, poetry, etc.; opposed to idealism, and implying less of crudeness than realism.

Gogol, the father of Russian naturalism, who wrote fifty years ago, was as full of literary consciousness as Thackeray or Dickens.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 479.

3. Specifically, in the fine arts, the rendering of nature, as it is, by the arts of design, but without either slavish fidelity or attempt at illusion. It is the mean between idealism and realism. — 4. In physics, that view of the world, and especially of man and human history and society, which takes account only of natural (as distinguished from supernatural) elements and forces.

On the basis of Nature, we may either look upon man as an individual distinct from other individuals, or we may consider the race as itself an organism apart from which the individual is unintelligible.

W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 17.

5. In theory: (a) The doctrine that natural religion is sufficient for salvation. (b) The doctrine that all religious truth is derived from a study of nature without any supernatural revelation, and that all religious life is a natural development, unaided by supernatural influences.

naturalist (nat'ū-rāl-ist), n. [= F. naturaliste = Sp. Pg. It. naturalista, < ML. naturalista, a naturalist, < L. naturalis, natural; see natural and -ist.] 1. One who understands natural causes; one who is versed in natural science or philosophy; specifically, one who is versed in or devoted to natural history; in the most restricted sense, a zoologist or botanist.

Naturalists observe that when the frost seizes upon what they are only the slighter and more watery parts of it that are subject to be congealed.

South, Sermons, II. 22.

2. One who holds the theological theory or doctrine of naturalism.

So far as the Spirit of God is above reason, so far doth a Christian exceed a mere naturalist.

Sp. Hall, Meditations and Vows, II. § 24.

naturalistic (nat'ū-rāl-ist'ik), a. [< naturalist + -ic.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or in accordance with nature; natural; not formal, conventional, or conventionalized; hence, simulating or resembling nature: as, a naturalistic effect of light on the stage.

Such vivacious and naturalistic expletives as would scarcely have passed the censor.

Athenaeum, No. 2840, p. 421.

2. Realistic.

"No one," as Señor Valdés truly says, "can rise from the perusal of a naturalistic book . . . without a vivid desire to escape" from the wretched world depicted in it.

Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 908.

3. Of, pertaining to, or based on naturalism in its philosophical or theological sense. — Naturalistic theory. See mythical theory, under mythical.

naturality (nat'ū-rāl'it-i), n. [< ME. naturalitie, < OF. (and F.) naturalité = Sp. naturalidad = Pg. naturalidade = It. naturalità, < L. naturalitas (f. pa, naturalis, < naturalis, natural; see natural.] The quality of being natural; naturalness.

The gods by their naturalitie and power close vp the furies, and governe the steers.

Golden Bore, v. (Richardson.)

naturalization (nat'ū-rāl-i-zā'shon), n. [< naturalis + -ation.] The act of naturalizing, or the state of being naturalized; specifically, in law, the act of receiving an alien into the condition, and investing him with the rights and privileges, of a natural subject or citizen. In the United States, by Rev. Stat. title xxx, § 2105, etc., persons of age, of the classes enumerated below, may be naturalized with their resident minor children, upon taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and renouncing all allegiance to a foreign prince or state: those over 21 who have (a) resided here at least five years continuously, and have legally declared their intention to be naturalized and to renounce foreign allegiance more than two years before naturalization; or (b) resided here for a continuous period of five years, of which three were during minority, or (c) resided here one year and have served in and been honorably discharged from the military forces of the United States, or (d) served three years on a merchant vessel of the United States after legal declaration of intention, etc. Citizens, etc., of countries at war with the United States are excepted. There are also provisions now nearly obsolete relating to the naturalization of aliens residing in the United States before January 20th, 1795, or between June 18th, 1798, and June 15th, 1812. Widows and children of those who have made legal declaration before death are deemed citizens. In Great Britain, by the Naturalization Act of 1870, no alien resident in the United Kingdom for a term of not less than five years, or who has been in the service of the crown for not less than five years, may obtain a certificate of naturalization. Also spelled naturalisation.

All States that are liberal of naturalization towards strangers are fit for empire.

Bacon, Kingdoms and Estates.

Naturalization implies the renunciation of a former nationality, and the fact of entrance into a similar relation towards a new body politic.

Woolsey, Introduct. to Inter. Law, § 66.

Naturalization Act, a British statute of 1870 (amended in 1872), under which aliens are allowed to hold real and personal property in the United Kingdom, additional facilities for aliens to become British subjects being also given, and provisions embodied enabling British subjects to become aliens.

naturalize (nat'ū-rāl-iz), v.; pret. and pp. naturalized, ppr. naturalizing. [= F. naturaliser = Sp. Pg. naturalizar = It. naturalizzare; as natural + -ize.] 1. To reduce to a state of nature; identify with, or make a part of, nature.

Human freedom must be understood in some different sense from that with which our anthropologists are familiar. If it is to stand in the way of the scientific impulse to naturalize the moral man.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 6.

2. To make natural; render easy and familiar by custom and habit.

He goes fresh to his hammer and anvil; custom has naturalized his labours to him.

South.

3. To confer the rights and privileges of a natural subject or citizen upon; receive under operation and form of law as a citizen of subject.

See naturalization.

Then the best way for a foreigner to break your existence is to be naturalized.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII, 322.

1. To receive or adopt as native, natural, or vernacular; incorporate into or make part and parcel of a language; receive into the original or common stock: as, to naturalize a foreign word or expression.

Sham must be foudroyant and pyramidal — If those French adjectives may be naturalized for this one particular emergency.

O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, xli.

2. So to adapt to new conditions of life that those conditions shall appear to be native to the person or thing naturalized; to introduce and acclimatize or cause to thrive as if indigenous: as, to naturalize a foreign plant or animal. (A plant that is naturalized is not merely habituated to the climate, but grows without cultivation. A naturalized animal is not only acclimated, as an elephant or a tiger in captivity, but shifts for itself and propagates, as rabbits in Australia or English sparrows in America.)

Living so amongst those Blacks, by time and cunning they seem to be naturalized amongst them.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I, 48.

Our melons, our peaches, our figs, our apricots, and cherries are strangers among us, imported in different ages, and naturalized in our English gardens.

Addison, The Royal Exchange.

3. In musical notation, to apply a natural or cancel (♮) to.

II. Intrans. 1. To explain phenomena by natural laws, to the exclusion of the supernatural.

We see how far the mind of an age is infected by this naturalizing tendency; let us note a few of the thousand and one forms in which it appears.

Bushnell, Nature and the Supernat., I.

2. To become like a native.

I have naturalized here (in London) perfectly, and have been more kindly received than is good for my modesty to remember.

Jeffrey.

3. To become a citizen of another than one's native country.

Also spelled naturalise.

naturally (nat'ū-rul-i), adv. 1. By nature; not by art or habit: as, he was naturally eloquent.

Fire, whose flame if ye make it is always pointed, and naturally by his force tends to clymbe.

Patterson, Art of Eng. Poets, p. 78.

We naturally know what is good, but naturally pursue what is evil.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I, 65.

2. Spontaneously; without art or cultivation.
For ayt he wrought it not naturally but willingly (purposely), he wrought it not to the uttermost of his power, but with such degree of goodness as his hye pleasure lyked to lynit.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 129.

3. Without affectation or artificiality — with ease or grace.

That part

Was aptly fitted and naturally performed.

Shak., T. of the S., Ind., I, 87.

4. According to the usual course of things: by an obvious consequence; of course.

Poverty naturally begets dependence.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvii.

naturalness (nat'ū-rul-ness), n. 1. The state of being natural: as, naturalness of conduct.

And to show the naturalness of monarchy, all the forms of government insensibly partake of it, and abide into it.

South, Sermons III, xli.

2. Conformity to nature, truth, or reality; absence of artificiality, exaggeration, or affectation: as, the naturalness of a person's conduct.

To seek to be natural implies a consciousness that forbids all naturalness forever.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 26.

nature (nā'tūr), n. And a. [(ME. nature, < OF.
nature, F. nature = Sp. nat., natura = < OFries.
natura = D. natuur = MĀG. nature = < OHG. natura, MHG. natüre, nature, G. natur = Sw. Dan.
natur, < L. natura, birth, origin, natural constitution or quality, < nasci, pp. natus, be born, originate: see nascit.] I. n. 1. Birth; origin; parentage; original stock.

"We are brethren," quod he, "of on nature, Kyng Aulerius my father is also."

Ge. Arden (E. E. T. S.) I, 235.

All of one nature, of one substance bred

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., I, 1, 11.

We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles.

Gal. II, 15.

2. The forces or processes of the material world, conceived of as an agency intermediate between the Creator and the world, producing all organisms and preserving the regular order of things:
as, in the old dictum, "nature abhors a vacuum."
In this sense nature is often personified.

And there is in this business more than nature
Was ever conducted at.

Shak., Tempest, v, 1, 242.

Then, nature, be my goddess; to thy law
My services are bound.

Shak., Lear, I, 2, 1.

Nature is the last of all causes that fabricates this operous and sensible world, and the utmost bound of incorporeal substances. Which, being full of reasons and powers, orders and presides over all mundane affairs.

Proculus (tr. by Cadworth), Comm. in Timæum, I.

Wherefore, since neither all things are produced fortuitously, or by the unguided mechanism of matter, nor God himself may reasonably be thought to do all things immediately and miraculously, it may well be concluded that there is a plastic nature under him, which as an inferior and subordinate instrument doth drudgingly execute that part of his providence which consists in the regular and orderly motion of matter; yet so as that there is also besides this a higher providence to be acknowledged, which, presiding over it, doth often supply the defects of it, and sometimes overrule it; forasmuch as this plastic nature cannot act electively nor with discretion.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, I, 2.

Nature never did betray

The heart that loved her.

Wordsworth, Thintern Abbey.

3. The metaphysical principle of life; the power of growth; that which causes organisms to develop each in its predetermined way. Aristotle defines nature as the principle of motion in those things that move themselves, moving by motion especially generation and corruption. Inasmuch as the most striking characteristic of growth is its regularity, nature is also conceived by Aristotle as the principle of inward necessity, as opposed to constraint on the one hand and to chance or freedom on the other. Hence nature is in literature frequently contrasted with gate and with compulsion, as well as with fortune and free election.

There are in sublimity bodies both constant tendencies and variable tendencies. The constant Aristotle calls nature, which always aspires to good, or to perpetual renovation of forms as perfect as may be, though impeded in this work by adverse influences, and therefore never producing any thing but individuals comparatively defective and sure to perish. The variable he calls spontaneity and chance, forming an independent agency inseparably accompanying nature always modifying, distorting, frustrating the full purposes of nature. Moreover, the different natural agencies often interfere with each other, while the irregular tendency interferes with them all. So far as nature acts in each of her distinct agencies, the phenomena before us are regular and predictable. All that is uniform, and all that, without being quite uniform, recurs usually or frequently is her work. But, besides and along with nature, there is the agency of chance and spontaneity, which is essentially irregular and unpredictable.

Grice, Aristotle, IV.

Oh! Let us sit and mock the good housewife Fortune
That she makes fair she scarce makes honest, and those that she makes honest she makes very ill-favoured.

Now, now then, now then, now then, now then, now then, Fortune reigns in the gifts of the world, not in the lineaments of Nature.

Shak., As you like it, I, 2, 44.

Yet had the number of her days
Been as complete as was her power,
Nature and Fate had had no strife
In giving limit to her life.

Milton, Epitaph on Marchioness of Winchester, I, 18.

4. Cause; occasion; that which produces any thing.

The nature of his great offence is dead.

Shak., All's Well, v, 3, 23.

5. The material and spiritual universe, as distinguished from the Creator; the system of things of which man forms a part; creation, especially that part of it which more immediately surrounds man and affects his senses, as mountains, seas, rivers, woods, etc.; as, the beauties of nature; in a restricted sense, whatever is produced without artificial aid, and exists unchanged by man, and is thus opposed to art.

All things are artificial: for Nature is the art of God.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici I, 16.

He needed not the spectacles of books to read Nature,
he looked inward, and found her there.

Bryden, Essay on Brain Poetry.

Nature is that world of substance whose laws are laws of cause and effect, and whose events transpire, in orderly succession, under those laws.

Bushnell, Nature and the Supernat., p. 43.

Nature, in the common sense, refers to existence unchanged by man — space, the air, the river, the leaf.

Emerson, Nature, p. 7.

Nature in the abstract is the aggregate of the powers and properties of all things. Nature means the sum of all phenomena, together with the causes which produce them, including not only all that happens, but all that is capable of happening; the unmet capabilities of causes being as much a part of the idea of nature as those which have taken effect.

J. S. Mill.

Hence—6. That which is conformed to nature or to truth and reality, as distinguished from that which is artificial, forced, conventional, or remote from actual experience: naturalness.

With this special observance, that you correct not the modesty of nature for anything so overdone is from the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now was and is, to hold us 't were, the mirror up to nature.

Shak., Hamlet, III, 2.

Only nature can please those tastes which are unprejudiced and refined.

Addison.

7. Inherent constitution, property, or quality; essential character, quality, or kind; the qualities or attributes which constitute a being or thing what it is, and distinguish it from all others; also, kind; sort; species; category; as, the nature of the soul; the divine nature; it is the nature of fire to burn; the compensation was in the nature of a fee.

I've then adeyn, worms corruptoun!

For no fors is of lak of thy nature.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, I, 615.

Things rank and gross in nature,

Shak., Hamlet, I, 2, 124.

I wish my years

Were fit to do you service in a nature

That might become a gentleman.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, I, 1.

Only this is certain that many regions lying in the same latitude afford Mine a very rich of diverse natures.

Capt. John Smith, Works, I, 125.

They [the Jews] apprehended the Crown of Thorns which was put upon our Saviour's head was the fittest representation of the nature of his Kingdom.

Shillingfleet, Sermons, I, viii.

The nature of her [Catherine Sedley's] influence over James is not easily to be explained.

Murculet, Hist. Wags., vi.

8. An original, wild, undomesticated condition, as of an animal or a plant; also, the primitive condition of man antecedent to institutions, especially to political institutions: as, to live in a state of nature.

That the condition of mere nature — that is to say, of absolute liberty, such as is theirs that are neither sovereigns nor subjects, is anarchy and the condition of war; that the precepts by which men are guided to avoid that condition are the laws of nature, that a commonwealth without sovereign power is but a world without substance, and cannot stand, that subjects owe to sovereigns simple obedience in all things in which their obedience is not repugnant to the laws of God, I have sufficiently proved.

Hobbes, Leviathan, II, 21.

9. The primitive aboriginal instincts, qualities, and tendencies common to mankind of all races and in all ages, as unchanged or uninfluenced by civilization; especially, the instinctive or spontaneous sense of justice, benevolence, affection, self-preservation, love of show, etc., common to mankind; naturalness of thought, feeling, or action; humanity.

For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves.

Rom. II, 14.

But, to Orlando — did he leave him there,
Food to the craked and hungry Hottentot?
Oh! Twice did he turn his back and purposed so;
But kindness, nobler ever than revenge,
And nature, stronger than his just occasion,
Made him give battle to the Hottentot.

Shak., As you like it, IV, 2, 100.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin,
That all, with one consent, praise new-born gawds.

Shak., T. and C., III, 3, 175.

If thou hast nature in thee, hear it not.

Shak., Hamlet, I, 3, 61.

Oh mother, do not lose your name, forged not
The touch of nature in you, tenderness!

Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodore, v, 2.

10. The physical or moral constitution of man; physical or moral being; the personality.

As surfeit is the father of much fast,
So every scope by the immoderate use Turns to restraint — our natures do pursue,
Like rats that eavin down their proper bane,
A thirsty evil, and when we drink we die.

Shak., M. for M., I, 2, 102.

Their drenched natures lie as in a death.

Shak., Macbeth, I, 7, 68.

Thus have they made profane that nature which God hath not only cleans'd, but Christ also hath assum'd.

Milton, Church-Government, II, 2.

Tird Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!

Young, Night Thoughts, I, 1.

11. Inborn or innate character, disposition, or inclination; inherent bent or disposition; individual constitution or temperament; inborn or natural endowments, as opposed to acquired;
hence, by metonymy, a person so endowed; as,
we instinctively look up to a superior nature.

His nature is too noble for the world;
He would not flatter Neptune for his trident,
Or Jove for a power to thunder. The heart's his mouth:
What his breast forges, that his tongue must vent.

Shak., Cor., III, 1, 226.

This can only succeed according to the nature and manners of the person they court, or solicit.

Beau. Moral Fables, IV, Expt.

It is your nature to have all men slayen
To you, but you acknowledging to none.

B. Jonson, Morianus, III, 1.

12. The vital powers of man; vitality; vital force; life; also, natural course of life; lifetime.

And the most part of him dyen with oaten Sykesness, whan nature layeth him for eide.

Manderly, Travels, p. 222.

Till the foul essence done in my days of nature
Are burnt and purged away.

Shak., Hamlet, I, 3, 12.

My offences being many, I would repent out the remainder of nature.

Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 272.
O, sir, you are old;
Nature in you stands on the very verge
Of her confine. Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 149.

13. In theol., the natural unregenerate state of the soul; moral character in its original condition, unaffected by grace.

We all . . . were by nature the children of wrath, even as others. Eph. ii. 3.

Yet if we look more closely we shall find Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind.
Nature affords at least a glimmering light.
The bees, though touched but faintly, are drawn right.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 21.

The Judgment, umpire in the strife
That Grace and Nature have to wage through life.
Comper, The Imm, l. 30.

14. Conscience.

Make thick my blood,
Stop up the access and passage to remorse,
That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose, nor keep peace between The effect and it! Shak., Macbeth, i. 4. 46.

15. Spontaneity; abandon; felicity; truth; naturalness.

With Shakspere's nature, or with Jonson's art.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 224.

Course of nature, crime against nature, debt of nature, effort of nature, freak of nature. See concord, crime, etc. Formal nature. See formal. Good nature. (a) Due natural affection.

And thereto all fables and moderns after good nature ought to teach her children to love all wrong and cruel wales, and show how the true right waye.
Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry, p. 4.

(b) Kindly disposition, a natural disposition such that one does not readily take or give offense, an easy, indulgent spirit. Ill nature, natural bad temper. In a state of nature. (a) Naked as when born; undeveloped. (b) In the state of the unregenerate. Individually nature. See individual. Interpretation of nature. See interpretation. Law of nature. (a) An unwritten law depending upon an instinct of the human race, universal conscience, or common sense. (This was the usual sense before the middle of the seventeenth century.)

If the young there be a bait for the old pike, I see no reason in the law of nature but I may snap at him.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 2. 367.

(b) The regular course of human life.
I died whilst in the womb he stayed,
Attending nature's law.
Shak., Cymbeline, v. 4. 38.

(c) See law. 3. Light of nature. See light. Long by nature. See long. Plastic nature. See the quotation from Chaucer under def. 2. The nature of things, the regular order or constitution of the universe. To go (rarely walk) the way of nature, to pay the debt of nature, to die.

He's walked the way of nature,
And to our purposes he lives no more.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 2. 4.

To relieve or ease nature, to evacuate the bowels.

II. a. Natural; growing spontaneously; as, nature gives a native bay. [Scotch.] nature (nā'tūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. natured, ppr. naturing. [ME. naturen; < nature, n.]
To endow with distinctive natural qualities.

He which natureth every kynde,
The mighty God. Gower, Conf. Amant, vii.

Others, similarly natured, will not permit him . . . to do this.
Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 97.

nature-god (nā'tūr-god), n. Same as nature-deity.

naturel, a. 1. A Middle English form of natural.—2. [F.] In her., same as proper.

natureless (nā'tūr-less), a. [< nature + -less.] Not consonant with nature; unnatural. Milton.

nature-myth (nā'tūr-mith), n. A myth symbolical of or supposed to be based on natural phenomena.

nature-print (nā'tūr-print), n. An impression obtained directly from a natural object, as a leaf, by means of one of the processes of nature-printing.

nature-printing (nā'tūr-prin'ting), n. A process invented by Alois Auer, in Vienna, Austria, in 1853, by which objects, such as plants, mosses, ferns, lace, etc., are impressed on a metal plate so as to engrave themselves, copies or casts being then taken for printing. The object is placed between a plate of copper and one of lead which are passed between heavy rollers, when a perfect impression is made on the leaden plate. From this the pressed lead plate an electrotype printing plate is cut. There are other processes, one of which consists in obtaining an impression from natural objects on sheets of softened gutta serena, from which an electrotype or a stereotype may then be taken. Also called phototype.

nature-spirit (nā'tūr-spir-it), n. An elemental; an intermediary being, supposed to be a spirit of some element, as a sylph of the air, a salamander of fire, a gnome of the earth, or an undine of the water.

nature-worship (nā'tūr-wēr'ship), n. A religion which deifies the phenomena of physical nature, such as the heavenly bodies, fire, the wind, trees, etc.; also, the principles or practice of such a religion.

naturism (nā'tūr-izm), n. [= F. naturisme; as nature + -ism.] 1. In med., a view which attributes everything to nature. Dunnington. [Rare.]—2. Worship of the powers of nature: same as nature-worship. Encyc. Brit., XX. 367.

naturist (nā'tūr-ist), n. [= F. naturiste; as nature + -ist.] 1. See the quotation.

Those that admit and applaud the vulgar notion of nature I must here advertise you, partly because they do so, and partly for brevity's sake, I shall hereafter many times call naturists.
Bacon, Works, v. 165.

2. A physician who trusts entirely to nature to effect a cure.

naturalistic (nā'tūr-ist'ik), a. [< naturist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to naturism or nature-worship. Encyc. Brit., XX. 366.

naturity (nā'tūr-ri-ti), n. [< nature + -ity.] The quality or state of being produced by nature. Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err.

naturize (nā'tūr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. naturized, ppr. naturizing. [< nature + -ize.] To endow with a nature or special qualities.

'Tis the secret
Of nature naturized 'gainst all infections.
E. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

nauch, n. See nauch.

Nauclerus (nā-klē'r-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ναυκλῆρ, a ship-owner, shipmaster, skipper, < ναῦς, a ship, + κλῆρ, lot, property; see clerk.] 1. In ornith., a genus of Falconidae, of the subfamily Milvina; the swallow-tailed kites. The type is the African N. nauclerus, and the genus has often also included the American N. nattereri, now usually called Elanoides forficatus. See note under Elanoides. 2. In ichth., a spurious genus of fishes, based on the young of Nauclerus, or a stage of development of the young pilot-fish, Nauclerus ductor, when a first dorsal fin and preopercular spines are present. Under Valenciennes, 1839.—3. [L. c.] The stage of growth represented by the spurious genus Nauclerus, 2, as of Seriola or any other genus of carangids.

Naucoridae (nā-kōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Naucoris + -idae.] A family of heteropterous insects founded by Leach, in 1818, upon the genus Naucoris; the water-scorpions. They are predaceous aquatic bugs flat bodied, and usually oval, living in quiet reedy pools, where they swim and creep about in search of their prey. They are widely distributed, and abundant in the southwestern United States and Mexico.

Naucoris (nā'kō-ris), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1762), < Gr. ναῦς, a ship, + κῶρ, a bug.] The typical genus of Naucoridae, formerly referred to the Nepidae. The species are Old World, being replaced in America by the members of the genus Pilocoris.

Nauclerus (nā'klē-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ναυκλῆρ, a fish so called, lit. holding a ship fast (cf. Echeurus), < ναῦς, a ship, + κλῆρ, rule, govern.] A genus of fishes of the family Carangidae; the pilot-fish. N. ductor is the type. See pilot-fish.

naufraige (nā'frāj), n. [< F. naufrage = Sp. frag., naufraige, < L. naufragium, a shipwreck, < ναῦς, a ship, + φράγναι (√ frag), break, dash to pieces; see nauf, fraction, fragile.] Shipwreck.
Guilty of the ruin and naufraige and perishing of infinite subjects.
Bacon, Speech on taking his place in Chancery.

naufraigeous, a. See naufraigeous.

naufraigeat (nā'frā-jāt), v. t. [< naufrage (L. naufragium) + -ate.] To shipwreck. Latham. Pilgrim's Farewell (1618).

The central part of a wheel, in which the spokes are inserted; the hub. See cuts under felly and hub.

In a Wheel, which with a long deep cut His turning passage in the dirt doth cut, The distant spokes nearer and nearer gather, And in the Nave unite their points together. Silverdell, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 23.

2f. The navel.

He unseam'd him from the nave to the chaps, And fix'd his head upon our battlements. Shak, Macbeth, I. 2. 22 nave (nav), n. [< OF. nave, F. nef = Pr. nav = Sp. nave = Pg. nav, nav = It. nave, a ship, a nave of a church, < L. navis, a ship, ML. also nave of a church, = Gr. ναῦς = Skt. nav, a ship, Nave. — Rheims Cathedral, France: 13th century.

= E. naeg, a ship. From L. navis are also navis, navis, navis, etc.; from Gr. ναῦς are navis, navis, navis, navis, etc. The main body, or middle part, lengthwise, of a church, extending typically from the chief entrance to the choir or chancel. In all but very small churches it is usual for the nave to be flanked by one or more aisles on each side, the aisles being, unless exceptionally, or typically in some local architectural styles, much lower and narrower than the nave. See aisle, and diagrams under cathedral, basilica, and bema.

nave (nāv), v. t.; pret. and pp. naved, pp. naving. [< nave, n.] To form as a nave; cause to resemble a nave in function or in effect.

Stand on the marble arch, . . . follow the graceful curve of the paces on the Lung' Arno till the arch is used by the massy dungeon tower . . . frowning in dark relief. Shelley, in London, II. 518.

nave (nāv), n. A Middle English contraction of navis, navis, have not.

nave-box (nāv'boks), n. A metallic ring or sleeve inserted in the nave of a wheel to diminish the friction and consequent wear upon the nave.

nave-hole (nāv'hōl), n. A hole in the center of a gun-truck for receiving the end of the axle-tree. Admiral Smyth.

navel (nā'vl), n. [Formerly also navel; < ME. navel, navel, < AS. nafela = OFries. nafela = D. navel = MLG. navel = OHG. navelo, navelo, MHG. nabel, nabel, G. nabel = Icel. nafi = Sw. naffe = Dan. nafle = Goth. nabalo*, not recorded, also with transposition, OIr. imbu = L. In anat., a mark or scar in the middle of the belly where the umbilical cord was attached in the fetus; the umbilicus; the omphalos. Hence—2. The central point or part of anything; the middle.

This hill (Amara) is situate as the navel of that Ethiopian body, and centre of their Empire, under the Equinoctial line. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 677.

Within the navel of this hideous wood, Immured in cypress shades, a sorcerer dwells. Milton, Comus, l. 520.

3f. The nave of a wheel.

His body be the navel to the wheel, In which your rapiers, like so many spokes, Shall meet. Mansinger, Parliament of Love, II. 3.

4. In ordnance, same as navel bolt.—Intestinal navel, the mark or scar on the intestine of most vertebrates denoting the place where the umbilical vesicle is finally absorbed in the intestine. The point is sometimes marked also by a kind of cicatrix, which forms a diverticulum of the intestine and may have a length of some inches. Navel bolt, the bolt which secures a carrousel to its axle. Also called navel. Navel orange. See orange. Navel point, in her., the point in a shield between the middle base point and the fess-point. Also called navel.

naveled, navelled (nā'vld), a. [< navel + -ed.] Furnished with a navel.

navel-gall (nā'vl-gāl), n. A bruise on the top of the chine of a horse, behind the saddle.

navel-hole (nā'vl-hōl), n. The hole in a mill-stone through which the grain is received. Hall, well.

navel-ill (nā'vl-il), n. Inflammation of the navel in calves, causing redness, pain, and swelling in the parts affected.

navelled, a. See naveled.

navel-string (nā'vl-string), n. The umbilical cord.

navelwort (nā'vl-wört), n. 1. A plant of the genus Cotyledon, chiefly C. Umbilicus: so called from the shape of the leaf. See Cotyledon, 2. Jack-in-the-bush, 2, and kidneywort, 1.—2. A plant of the genus Omphalodes: so called from the form of the nutlets. O. verna is the blue or spring navelwort, O. hirsuta the white navelwort; both are garden flowers.—Venus's navelwort, either of the above species of Omphalodes.

nave-shaped (nāv'shāpt), n. Same as modioliform.

navette (nā'vet'), n. [< F. navette, OF. navete = It. navetta, < ML. naveta, a little boat, dim. of L. navis, a ship, boat; see nave.] An incense-boat; a navicula.

navew (nā'vū), n. [Also naphew; < OF. navew, navel, < ML. napellus, dim. of L. napus (> AS. nap, > E. nap), a kind of turnip; see nap.] The wild turnip, Brassica campestris. It is an annual weed with a tapering root, found in waste grounds throughout European and Asiatic Russia. [Eng.]

Navicella (nav-i-sel'), n. [NL., = F. navicelle, < L. navicula, a small vessel, Navicella parvula.

sign. of naris, a ship: see naris. 1. In conch., a notable genus of fresh-water nautilus, or limpet-like shells of the family Nautilidae. They resemble an operculate slipper-limpet, having the aperture nearly as large as the shell. They inhabit the Indian archipelago.

2. [L. c.] In jewelry-work, a minute hollow vessel of the general form of a bowl, a dish, or the like, used as a pendant or drop, as to an ear-ring.

navicula (nā-vik'ū-lā), n.; pl. naviculæ (-læ). [L. navicula, a small vessel, dim. of navis, a ship: see naris.] 1. Eccles., a vessel formed like the hull of a boat, used to hold a supply of incense for the thurible; an incense-boat.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Bory, 1822).] A genus of diatoms, typical of the family Naviculaceæ, having the oblong or lanceolate frustules free, the valves convex, with a median longitudinal line, and nodules at the center and extremities,

1. Navicula tumida, different views. 2. Navicula (cruciate). 3. Navicula punctulata. 4. Navicula spirographa. 5. Navicula trilineata. 6. Navicula (reticulate). All magnified.

valves striated, and the striae resolvable into dots. The genus is widely distributed and contains several hundred species, many of which rest on very slight characters.

Naviculaceæ (nā-vik'ū-lā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Navicula + -acæ.] A family of diatoms, typified by the genus Navicula.

navicular (nā-vik'ū-lār), a. and n. [= F. naviculaire = Sp. Pg. navicular = It. scolare, < LL. navicularis, relating to ships or shipping; < L. navicula, a small ship or boat: see navicula.] 1. a. 1. Relating to small ships or boats; shaped like a boat; cymbiform. Specifically—2. In anat., scaphoid: applied to certain bones of the hand and foot. See II.—3. In entom., oblong or ovate, with a concave disk and raised margins, as the bodies of certain insects.—4. In bot., resembling or belonging to the genus Navicula; boat-shaped.—Navicular fossa, the scaphoid fossa at the base of the pterygoid bone, giving attachment to the tensor palati muscle.

II. n. In anat.: (a) The scaphoid bone of the carpus; the radiale, or bone of the proximal row on the radial side of the wrist. See out under hand. (b) The scaphoid bone of the tarsus, a bone of the proximal row, on the inner or tibial side, in special relation with the astragalus and the cuneiform bones. See out under foot. (c) A large transversely extended sesamoid bone developed in the tendon of the deep flexor, at the back of the distal phalangeal articulation of the foot of the horse, between the coronary and the coffin-bone. See out under fetter-bone.

naviculare (nā-vik'ū-lā-rē), n.; pl. navicularia (-rī-ā). [NL., neut. of LL. navicularis, relating to ships or shipping: see navicular.] A navicular or scaphoid bone: more fully called os naviculare.

naviculoid (nā-vik'ū-lōid), a. [L. navicula, a small ship or boat. + Gr. -oides, form.] Boat-shaped; scaphoid; navicular.

naviform (nā-vi-fōrm), a. [L. navis, a ship, + forma, form.] Resembling a boat; navicular: applied to parts of plants.

navigability (nav'i-gā-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. navigabilité; as navigable + -ity: see -ibility.] The state or condition of being navigable; navigableness.

navigable (nav'i-gā-bl), a. [= F. navigable = Sp. navegable = Pg. navegavel = It. navigabile, navigabile, < L. navigabilis, < navigare, pass over in a ship: see navigate.] 1. Capable of being navigated; affording passage to ships: as, a navigable river. At common law, in England, a river is deemed navigable as far as the tide ebbs and flows. In the United States the legal meaning of navigable has been much extended, and it includes generally all waters practically available for floating commerce by any method, as by rafts or boats.

The Loire . . . is a very goodly navigable river (Cortat, Crutides, I. 40).

2. Subject to a public right of water-passage for persons or property.

navigableness (nav'i-gā-bl-nes), n. The property of being navigable; navigability.

navigably (nav'i-gā-bli), adv. So as to be navigable.

navigant (nav'i-gant), n. [OF. navigant = Sp. navegante = It. navigante, navigante, a navigator, < L. navigant (-s, ppr. of navigare, pass over in a ship: see navigate.] A navigator. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 213.

navigate (nav'i-gāt), v.; pret. and pp. navigated, ppr. navigating. [L. navigatus, ppr. of navigare (< It. navigare, navigare = Pg. Sp. navegar = Pr. navegar, navigar = OF. naver, also nager, F. nager, also naviguer), sail, go by sea, sail over, navigate, < navis, a ship, + agere, lead, conduct, go, move: see *nave*² and agent.] I. intrans. 1. To move from place to place in a ship; sail.

The Phoenicians navigated to the extremities of the Western ocean. (Arbuthnot, Ant. Colln.)

2. To direct or manage a ship.

II. trans. 1. To pass over in ships; sail on. Trajan, the Father of the Emperor Claudius, was the first who navigated the Northern ocean. (Arbuthnot, Ant. Colln., p. 272.)

2. To steer, direct, or manage in sailing; direct the course of, as a vessel, from one place to another: as, to navigate a ship. [The word is also used by extension, in all its senses, of balloons and the like, and colloquially of other means and modes of progression.]

navigating-lieutenant (nav'i-gā-ting-lū-ten-ant), n. See master, 1 (b).

navigation (nav'i-gā-shon), n. [= F. navigation = Sp. navegacion = Pg. navegacao = It. navigazione, navigazione, < L. navigatio (-n), a sailing, a passing over in a ship, < navigare, sail: see navigate.] 1. The act of navigating; the act of moving on water in ships or other vessels; sailing: as, the navigation of the northern seas; also, by extension, the act of "sailing" through the air in a balloon (see aerial navigation, below).—2. The science or art of directing the course of vessels as they sail from one part of the world to another. The management of the sails, etc., the holding of the assigned course by proper steering, and the working of the ship generally, pertain rather to seamanship, though necessary to successful navigation. The two fundamental problems of navigation are: the determination of the ship's position at a given moment, and the decision of the most advantageous course to be steered in order to reach a given point. The methods of solving the first are, in general, four: (1) by reference to one or more known and visible landmarks; (2) by ascertaining through soundings the depth and character of the bottom; (3) by calculating the direction and distance sailed from a previously determined position (see dead-reckoning, log, and compass); and (4) by ascertaining the latitude and longitude by observations of the heavenly bodies. (See latitude and longitude.) The places of the sun, moon, planets and fixed stars are deduced from observation and calculation, and are published in nautical almanacs (see almanac), the use of which, together with logarithmic and other tables computed for the purpose, is necessary in reducing observations taken to determine latitude, longitude, and the error of the compass. 3. Ships in general; shipping. [Poetical.]

Though the yeasty waves Confound and swallow navigation up. (Shak., Macbeth, IV. 1. 72.)

4. An artificial waterway, or a part of a natural waterway that has been made navigable: a canal. Also navy. See *navy*¹. [Eng.]

"The Kennet Navigation" a very old canal which connects the waters of the East with those of the West country. (The Academy, July 6, 1890, p. 13.)

Act of Navigation, an act which was first passed by the British Parliament in 1661, under Cromwell's administration, was reenacted in 1690, and remained in force, with various modifications; it was greatly altered in 1825 and at other times, and finally repealed in 1849. Its object was to encourage the British merchant marine by reserving to it the whole of the import trade from Asia, Africa, and America, and the chief part of that from Europe. This end it accomplished by denying to foreign vessels the right to bring to England any goods not produced in their respective countries, and also by restrictions in regard to fisheries and the coasting trade. The act was aimed especially at the Dutch, who possessed at that time almost a monopoly of the carrying-trade of the world. Aerial navigation, the sailing or floating in the air by means of balloons or airships; particularly, the principles, problems, and practice involved in the attempt to pass from place to place through the air by means of balloons or flying machines capable of being propelled and steered. — Arterial navigation. See aristal.—Inland navigation, the passing of boats or vessels on rivers, lakes, or canals in the interior of a country; conveyance by boats or vessels within a country. — Navigation laws, the various acts and regulations in any country which define the nationality of its ships, the manner in which they shall be engaged, the privileges to which they have claim, and the conditions regulating the engagement of foreign ships in the trade of the country in question, either as importers and exporters or with relation to coasting-traffic. The first British navigation law of importance was enacted under Richard II. It provided that no merchandises should be imported into England or exported from the king's realm by any of his subjects except in English ships, under penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo.

navigational (nav-i-gā-shon-āl), a. [navigation + -al.] Of or pertaining to navigation; used in navigation.

navigator (nav'i-gā-tor), n. [= F. navigateur = Sp. Pg. navegador = It. navigatore, navigatore, < L. navigator, a sailor: see navigate.] 1. One who navigates or sails; especially, one who directs the course of a ship, or is skillful in the art of navigation. In the merchant marine the commanding officer usually navigates the vessel; in most of war, of nearly all nationalities, one of the three officers or executive officers (in the United States navy the third in rank) is detailed for that duty. In the United States navy the navigator, in addition to his other duties, has charge of the log book, of the steering gear, of the anchors and chains, and of the stowage of the hold, and has also general supervision of the ordnance and ordnance-stores.

2. A laborer on a "navigation" or canal (see navigation, 4), or on a railway. Now usually abbreviated navvy (see *navvy*²). [Eng.]

navvy¹ (nav'i), n. [Abbr. of navigation, 4.] Same as navigation, 4.

In Skipton in Craven the canal is vulgarly called "the navvy." The horse path or towing path is always "the navvy bank"; a bridge in Mill-hill Street is "the navvy bridge"; and a garden on one of the slopes of the canal was always called "the navvy garden." (N. and Q., 4th ser., VI. 495.)

navvy² (nav'i), n. [Abbr. of navigator, 2.] 1. Same as navigator, 2.—2. A common laborer engaged in such work as the making of canals or railways. [Eng.]

It has been for years past a well-established fact that the English navvy, eating largely of flesh, is far more efficient than a continental navvy living on a less nutritive food. (H. Spencer, Education, p. 255.)

3. A power machine for excavating earth. A common form has an excavating scoop, crab, or analogous device for scooping up earth or gravel, or grasping stones, with a boom and tackle for lifting and operating the scoop, etc., and a steam hoisting-engine, all mounted on a supporting platform provided with four wheels so that it can be moved on a temporary railway for changing its position. Similar machines are also mounted on large scow boats for use along water fronts. Also called steam-excavator.

navy¹ (nav'i), n.; pl. navies (-viz). [ME. navi, navye, navye, navre, < OF. navi, < OP. navi, navre, navi, navy, a ship, a fleet, a navy, < IL. navi, ships, neut. pl. for L. naves, fem. pl. of navis, a ship: see *nave*².] 1. A ship.

A great number of navies to that haven longest. (William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 5719.)

And no man may praise that see be Navye, no be no man of craft, and therefore may no man know what Land is bound that see. (Mandeville, Travels, p. 278.)

2. A company of ships; a fleet.

My glorious sovereign, on the western coast Rides a puissant navy. (Shak., Rich. III., IV. 4. 434.)

3. All the ships belonging to a country, collectively; in a wide sense, the ships, their officers and crew and equipment, and the department of the government charged with their management and control. Specifically—(a) All the war-ships belonging to a nation or a monarch, the military navy; in Great Britain distinguished by the title of Royal Navy. In the United States the control of the navy is vested in a cabinet officer called the secretary of the Navy, the head of the Navy Department. (See department.) The government of the royal navy is vested in the Board of Admiralty, or lords commissioners for discharging the office of lord high admiral. The board consists of the following members: the first lord, who has supreme authority, and is a member of the cabinet; the senior naval lord, who directs the movements of the fleet and is responsible for their discipline; the second naval lord, who superintends the manning of the fleet, coast guard, transport department, etc.; the junior naval lord, who deals with the victualling of the fleets, medical department, etc.; a civil lord, member of Parliament, who is also connected with the civil branch of the service; a controller of the navy, and an expert tribune. Under the board is a financial secretary, changing like the five lords, with the government in power. There is a permanent secretary, and a number of heads of departments. (b) All the ships and vessels employed in commerce and trade: usually called the merchant marine or merchant navy.

4. The men who man a navy or fleet; the officers and men of the military marine.

Then was the navie apparelled and entered in to shippos. (Mandeville (E. E. T. S.), II. 664.)

Navy blue. See blue. navy², n. An obsolete form of *navvy*².

4. Characterized by nicety of appearance, construction, arrangement, etc.; nice; hence, orderly; trim; tidy; often, specifically, clean: as, a neat box; the apartment was always very neat; neat in one's dress.

These elephants have neat little boarded houses or castles fastened on their backs, where the great men sit in state, secured from the sun or rain.

Dunlap, Voyage, II. 1. 73.

Her artless manners and her neat attire.

Cooper, Task, IV. 536.

5. Well-shaped or well-proportioned, elegant: as, a neat foot and ankle.—6. Complete in character, skill, etc.; exact; finished; adroit; clever; skillful: applied to persons or things.

Men. To be a villain is no such rude matter. Can. No, if he be a neat one, and a perfect Art makes all excellent.

Pletcher, Wife for a Month, I. 2.

Paddy overtook him at last, and gave him a clippeen on the left ear, and a neat touch of the foot that sent him sprawling.

Lever, Dodd Family Abroad I. letter I.

The neat rapier, the eloquence that left the House too profoundly affected to deliberate, the original of the novelist's greatest creation—they are all vanishing like frost foliage at sunrise.

G. W. Curtis, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 472.

7. Spruce; finical; over nice.

Still to be neat, still to be drest As you were going to a feast.

H. Jonson, Epicoene, I. 1.

8. A commendatory word, used somewhat vaguely.

Tell what dressing up of houses there were by all the neat dames and ladies within the freedom.

Dekker, Oration of Parimony.

This gentleman did take to wife A neat and gallant dame, Gentleman in Thracia (Child's Ballads, VIII. 150).

neat² (nēt), adv. [neat, a.] Neatly.

They've taken her out at nine at night, And headed her bath neat and fine The Laird of Warriand (Child's Ballads, III. 322).

neath (nēth), adv. An abbreviated form of beneath.

neat-handed (nēt-han'dod), a. Using the hands with neatness; deft; dexterous.

Herbs, and other country muses, Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses.

Milton, L'Allegro, I. 86.

neatherd (nēth'erd), n. [ME. neetherde, neherde; C. neal + herd.] Cf. notherd. A person who has the care of cattle; a cow-keeper.

Would I were A neat-herd's daughter.

Shak., Cymbeline, I. 1. 140.

neatherdess (nēth'herd-es), n. [C. neatherd + -ess.] A female neatherd; a neatress.

Pay hark how I can now express my love unto my Neatherdess.

Herrick, A Recollekt, or Discourse of Neatherdes.

neat-house (nēt'hous), n. [C. neat + house.] A house for neat cattle; a cow-house.

neatify (nēt'i-fi), v. t. Same as netify.

neat-land (nēt'land), n. [C. neat + land.] In law, land let out to yeomanry. Cowell.

neatly (nēt'li), adv. In a neat manner; with neatness, in any sense of that word.

neatness (nēt'nes), n. The state or quality of being neat, in any sense of that word.

neatress (nēt'res), n. [Irreg. C. neat + -ress + -ess.] A female neatherd. Warner, Albion's England, IV. 20.

neb (neb), n. [Also in mod. use in var. form nib: C. ME. neb, C. AS. neb, nebb, bill, beak (of a bird, ship, plow, etc.), nose, of a person, also face, countenance, = D. neb, mouth, bill, nib, = MLG. nebbe, nibbe, LG. nibbe, nipp, niff, nuff (> It. niffa, niffa, snout) = Lecl. n. f., also nebbi: Sw. niff, nibb = Dan. nrb, beak, bill; prob. orig. nebb*; cf. MD. snubbe, D. such = MLG. snubbe, snibbe, LG. snibbe, snippe, bill, snout, = G. schneppe, nozzle; also with dim. term., OFries. snavel, snarl, mouth, = D. snavel, snout, = MLG. snavel = OHG. snabul, MHG. snabul, G. schnabel = Dan. Sw. (after G.) snabel, bill, snout, proboscis, nozzle; cf. Lith. snapas, bill, beak; perhaps from the root of the verb snap, but whether orig. the bill of a bird or snout of a beast, which 'snaps' up what is to be eaten, or the snout of a beast or nose of a man, which 'snouts' or 'sniffs' (G. schnuppen, gasp, schnauben, sport, sniff, snuff), is not clear. See snep, sniff, snuff, snivel, etc.] 1. The bill or beak of a bird; also, the snout or muzzle of a beast.

How she holds up the neb, the bill, to him? And arms her with the boldness of a wife To her allowing husband! Shak., W. T., I. 2. 183.

The amorous worms of love did hither gnaws and tears his heart with the nebs of their forked heads.

Painter's Pal. of Pl., cited by Steevens. (Norm.)

2. The nose: as, a lang neb; a sharp neb. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

See, yonder's the Ratton's Skerry; he eye held his neb above the water in my day, but he's aneath it now.

Scott, Antiquary, VII.

3. The face. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Josep cam into halle and saw his bar-thren wepe, He keneith Benjumin, upon his neb he gan wipe.

MS. Bodl. 65.2, l. 10. (Halliwell.)

4. The tip end of anything; a sharp point: as, the neb of a lancet or knife. See nib. [Scotch.]

—5. The nib of a pen. See nib.

Those penes are made of purpose without nebs, because they may cast ink but slowly.

Dekker, Lanthorne and Candle-light.

Neb and feather, completely; from top to toe. [Scotch.]

—To dab nebs. See dab.

Nebalia (nē-bā'li-a), n. [NL.; origin not ascertained.] 1. A remarkable genus of uncertain position among the lower crustaceans, ranged by Huxley among the phyllopodous Branchiopoda, by others in a peculiar order named Phyllocarida or Lepidocarpa. It has a large carapace (cephalothorax) with mobile rostrum; the eyes are large and poliolated; there are well developed antennae, mandibles, and two pairs of maxillae, the anterior of which ends in a long palp.

2. A genus of rotifers. Grube, 1862.

neballian (nē-bā'li-an), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the genus Nebalia.

II. n. A nebular crustacean.

Neballides (nē-bā'li-dēs), n. pl. [C. Nebalia + -ides.] A family of crustaceans, typified by the genus Nebalia. It has been variously located in the systems, and is now usually considered a synthetic type nearly related to some Murrian forms and representative of an order or suborder named Phyllocarida or Lepidocarpa. The anterior part of the body has a large compressed bivalvular carapace with a separate anterior tongue-shaped process, the abdomen is long and segmented; there are eight pairs of phyllopodous legs to the trunk, four pairs of large pleopods behind, and no telson. The living species are marine, and have been referred to 8 genera.

nebbuk-tree (neb'uk-trē), n. [C. Ar. nebbuk + E. tree.] A shrub, Zizyphus Spina-Christi, one of the Christ's-thorns.

The chambers of streams around Jericho are filled with nebbuk trees. . . . It is a variety of the rhamnus, and is set down by botanists as the Spina Christi, of which the Saviour's neck crown of thorns was made.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracens, p. 68.

nebbly (neb'li), a. [C. neb + -ly.] Snappish; saucy; impudent; bold; pert. [Scotch.]

nebel (neb'el), n. [Heb.] A stringed instrument of the ancient Hebrews, by some supposed to have resembled a harp, by others a lute. The name is differently rendered in different parts of the English version of the Bible.

neb-neb (neb'neb), n. See bablah.

Nebraska (nē-bras'kan), a. and n. [C. Nebraska (see def.) + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the State of Nebraska, or its inhabitants.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Nebraska, one of the Western States of the United States, lying west of the Missouri river and north of Kansas.

nebris (neb'ris), n. [L. nebris, G. nebris, a fawn-skin (see def.), C. nebris, a fawn.] A fawn skin; specifically, in ancient Greek and affiliated art and ceremonial, the skin of a fawn or of a similar animal, as a kid, worn as a special attribute by Dionysus or Bacchus and his attendant train (Pan, the satyrs, the maenads, etc.), and assumed on festival occasions by priests and priestesses of Bacchus, and by his votaries generally.

nebula (neb'u-lā), n.; pl. nebulae (-lē). [C. L. nebula = Gr. nebulē, a cloud, mist, vapor; see nebul.] 1. A luminous patch in the heavens, far beyond the limits of the solar system. Some nebulae are resolvable into clusters, generally globular, in which the separate stars can be distinguished. These are for the most part in the Galaxy. The remaining nebulae are of two types, according as their spectra are continuous or consist of bright lines. The latter class are greenish-blue, have fairly definite outlines, and show a tendency to concentration toward the galactic circle. Of the three brightest lines in their spectra two are unshifted, and one is the H line of hydrogen. There are six or seven other faint lines, two of them hydrogen. There are besides nebulous stars or stars with haze about them which in some cases is of vast proportions. The continuous spectra indicate that all these nebulae are solid, liquid, or if gaseous, enormously condensed. The nebula in Andromeda (M31) and A 95 are visible to the naked eye. The Galaxy, the Magellanic clouds, and the clusters Berenice's Hair and Praesepe are not included by astronomers among the nebulae.

2. In pathol., a cloud-like spot on the cornea.—Dumb-bell nebula, a nebula which, seen in a telescope of small power, appears to have a form like a dumb-bell described in a fainter ellipse, but with a more powerful instrument is seen to have a spiral structure.—Planetary nebula, a circular or elliptical gaseous nebula, with a well-defined outline.—Resolvable nebula, a nebula in which a powerful telescope detects many points of light, which, however, are not usually distinguished as perfectly as in a cluster.—Ring nebula, or annular nebula, a nebula which appears like a ring with a dark center.—Spiral nebula, a nebula which presents the appearance either of a convoluted stream or of a number of such streams proceeding from a center.

nebular (neb'ū-lār), a. [= F. nebulaire, C. NL. nebularis, C. L. nebula, a cloud; see nebul.] 1. Like a nebula; cloudy.—2. Pertaining or relating to a nebula.—The nebular hypothesis, a theory of the formation of the solar system, originated by the philosopher Kant and the astronomer Sir William Herschel, and developed by Laplace and others. The solar system is supposed to be the result of the gradual condensation of a nebula under the action of the mutual gravitation of its parts.

nebule (neb'ūl), n. [C. ME. nebula, C. OF. nebula = It. nebula, C. L. nebula, a cloud, a mist, vapor, = Gr. nebulē, a cloud, mass of clouds, = OF. nebbal = OFries. nevil = D. nevel = MLG. nevel, neffel, LG. nevel = OHG. nebul, nepol, MHG. G. nebel = Lecl. niff (in comp.), mist, fog; cf. Lecl. njoil, night.] 1. A cloud.

O light without nebule, shining in thy sphere.

Ballade in Commend. of Our Lady.

The stocking is of silver tissue, worked with gold birds, flowers, blue, yellow, and white, and a peculiar ornament a nebule, white and blue, with yellow rays shooting from its edge.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, II. 251.

2. In her., a line nebule. See nebul.

nebulé (neb'ū-lā'), a. [Heraldic F., C. OF. nebula, a cloud; see nebul.] In her., wavy; curved in and out, in fancied resemblance to the edge of a cloud. A line nebule may form the boundary of a fesse, bend, etc. Also nebulose, nebuly.

nebuliferous (neb'ū-lif'e-rus), a. [C. L. nebula, a cloud, + ferre = F. bear.] Having nebulous or cloudy spots.

Thomas, Med. Diet.

nebulist (neb'ū-list), n. [C. nebula + -ist.] One who upholds the nebular hypothesis. Page.

nebulize (neb'ū-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. nebulized, ppr. nebulizing. [C. nebula + -ize.] To reduce to a spray; atomize.

nebulizer (neb'ū-liz-er), n. An instrument for reducing a liquid to spray, for inhalation, disinfection, etc.; an atomizer.

The spray from a . . . nebulizer being made to impinge upon the wall of the vessel containing the tubes and liquid.

Medical News, XLIX. 397.

nebulose (neb'ū-lōs), a. [C. L. nebulosus, misty; see nebul.] 1. Cloudy; foggy; nebulous.

Alle fatty, wet, & cloudy nebulose.

Palladius, Husbandrie (R. E. T. A.), p. 175.

2. In entom., having indistinct darker and paler markings, resembling the irregular coloring of a cloud; said of a surface.—3. In her., same as nebul.

nebulosity (neb'ū-lōs'i-ti), n.; pl. nebulosities (-tiz). [= F. nébulosité = Sp. nebulosidad = Pg. nebulosidade = It. nebulosità, C. L. nebulositas, cloudiness, obscurity, C. L. nebulosus, cloudy; see nebul.] 1. The state of being nebulous or cloudy; cloudiness; haziness; the essential character of a nebula.

All the material ingredients of the earth existed in this diffuse nebulosity, either in the state of vapour, or in some state of still greater expansion.

Whewell.

2. The faint misty appearance surrounding certain stars; an ill-defined nebula without local condensation; also, a nebula in general.

Various connected nebulosities stretching in marvellous ramifications along the heavens.

J. N. Lockyer, Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 400.

A nebulosity of the milky kind, like that wonderful, inexplicable phenomenon about θ Orionis.

A. M. Clerke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 20.

nebulous (neb'ū-lus), a. [= F. nébuleux = Sp. nebuloso, C. L. nebulosus, cloudy, misty, foggy, C. nebula, mist, cloud; see nebul, nebul.] 1. Cloudy; hazy; used literally or figuratively.

Epicurus is impatient of the nebulous regions which only exist, according to him, for highly sensitive and sentimental souls.

F. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 146.

2. In astron., pertaining to a nebula; having the appearance of a nebula; nebular.—Nebulous star. See nebula.

nebulousness (neb'ū-lus-nes), n. The state or quality of being nebulous; cloudiness.

nebuly (neb'ū-li), a. [C. Heraldic F. nebule; see nebul.] Same as nebulé.—Nebuly meeting. See meeting.

nebet, n. A Middle English form of nece.

necessitate, v. t. [ME. necessitate, < ML. necessare, make necessary, compel, < L. necesse, necessary; see necessary.] To make necessary; compel.

No fortune causes necessitate the never to compound work of solitary maters. Chambers, Booths, III, meter 2.

necessary, a. [OF. necessaire, < L. necessarius, necessary; see necessary.] Necessary. [Scotch.]

The gnyt adols necessary. Aberd. Reg. MS. (Jamieson.)

necessarius (nes-sa'-ri-an), a. and n. [L. necessarius, inevitable, necessary, + -an.] I. a. Relating to necessitarianism; necessitarian. II. n. One who accepts the doctrine of necessitarianism; a necessitarian.

The only question in dispute between the advocates of philosophical liberty and the necessarians is this: "whether volition can take place independently of motive." W. Delsham, Philos. of the Mind, II, § 1.

Necessarians will say that even this voluntary effort for a good end is ultimately the effect of causes extraneous to the man's self. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 258.

necessitarianism (nes-sa'-ri-an-izm), n. [necessarian + -ism.] The doctrine that the action of the will is a necessary effect of antecedent causes; the theory that the will is subject to the general mechanical law of cause and effect. Also necessitarianism, and rarely necessism.

Let us suppose, further, that we do not know more of cause and effect than a certain definite order of succession among facts, and that we have a knowledge of the necessity of that succession - and hence of necessary laws - and I, for my part, do not see what escape there is from utter materialism and necessitarianism. Huxley necessarily (nes-sa'-ri-ly), adv. In a necessary manner; by necessity; so that it cannot be otherwise; inevitably.

The Author has shown us that design in all the Works of Nature which necessarily leads us to the Knowledge of its First Cause. Addison, Spectator, No. 339.

Powerful temperaments are necessarily intense. Freude, Sketches, p. 183.

necessariness (nes-sa'-ri-ness), n. The state of being necessary. Johnson.

necessary (nes-sa'-ri), a. and n. [Formerly also necessar; < ME. necessary, necessarie, < OF. necessaire, F. necessaire = Pr. necessarius, < Sp. necessario = Pg. It. necessario, < L. necessarius, unavoidable, inevitable, indispensable, requisite (as a noun, necessarius, m., necessarius, f., a relative, kinsman, friend, client; necessarius, neut. pl., necessarii of life; ML. necessarius, neut., necessaria, f., a privy). Cicero, adj., unavoidable, inevitable, indispensable, neut. adj., with esse and habere, prop. adv., also in OL. necessum, prob. orig. ne cessum or non cessum, < ne, non, not, + cessus, pp. of cedere, yield; see cede.] I. a. 1. Such as must be; that cannot be otherwise. (a) As an inference, evidently of such a form that every like inference from true premises will always yield a true conclusion, in every state of facts. In philosophy it is requisite to distinguish an irresistible inference, the force of which may be blindly felt, from a necessary one which is seen to belong to a possible class of inferences, all true. (b) As a proposition or fact, true or taking place not merely in the actual state of things, but in every possible state of things (within some meaning of the word possible). A necessary proposition should not be confounded with an absolutely certain one, far less with one we are irresistibly compelled to believe. (c) As a thing or being, existing in every possible state of things; having existence involved in its essence. Thus, God is said by Anselm, Descartes, and others to be a necessary being.

Death, a necessary end, Will come when it will come. Shak., J. C., II, 2, 36.

In asserting that the human mind possesses in its own ideas an element of necessary and universal truth, not derived from experience, Kant had been anticipated by Price, by Cadworth, and even by Plato.

Given such a cause - that is, a cept the idea of God and worship follows as a consequence, may, a necessary consequence. Misart, Sature and Thought, p. 230.

The only way that any thing that is to come to pass hereafter is or can be necessary is by a connection with something that is necessary in its own nature, or something that already is or has been: so that, the one being supposed the other certainly follows. Edwards, on the Will, I, 3.

2. Such that it cannot be disregarded or omitted; indispensable; requisite; essential; needed; required. as, air is necessary to support animal life; food is necessary to nourish the body.

Advertisements and counsells verin necessarie for all noble men and counsellors. Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. 8., extra ser.), I, 74.

"A nimble hand is necessary for a cut-purse. Shak., W. T., IV, 2, 393.

A country replenished with all manner of commodities necessary for mans life. Coryat, Creditas, I, 104.

Neither dreads any man complain of inflation, . . . this his cause he never so just: and therefore justice in this Country as necessary for poor people as in any part of the World. Bumpler, Voyages, II, 1, 75.

The enemies of the court might think it fair, or even absolutely necessary, to encounter bribery with bribery. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. In law: (a) Requisite for reasonable convenience and facility or completeness in accomplishing the purpose intended: as, the land necessary for building a railroad. (b) Naturally and inseparably connected in the ordinary course: as, necessary consequences. Thus, the necessary consequences of a trespass, such as depreciation in value of a thing injured, or the suffering of a person injured, are general damages, and need not be pleaded; but loss of profits or medical expenses are not necessary consequences in the legal sense, and must be specially alleged.

4. Acting from compulsion or the absolute determination of causes: opposed to free. See free.

Agents that have no thought, no volition at all, are in every thing necessary agents. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xxi, 13.

Necessary being, one whose non existence is impossible; God. - Necessary cause. See cause, 1. Necessary condition, one, inference, mark, etc. See the nouns. Necessary proposition, a proposition which asserts a fact to be necessary; also, one which we cannot help believing.

Necessary rules of thought, those without which no use of the understanding would be possible. - Necessary sign, one which affords a certain indication of the thing represented. - Necessary to an end, proceeding or accomplishing the end in every possible state of things; requisite as a means to the end. - Syn. 2. Necessary, Essential, Requisite, Needful. The following remarks refer to the application of the words to ordinary practical affairs, not to philosophy. Necessary is so general a word that it covers all the others, and has the additional sense, which they do not have, of inevitable. Essential is an absolute word, noting that which is a part of the chief end of the action or of every mode of bringing that end about. Requisite is less strong than essential, and needful is less strong still, yet each is strong and emphatic, applying to that which is imperatively needed. Needful generally applies to concrete, and often to temporary, things: as, knowledge of the countries visited is needful, and even essential, to enjoyment of travel, but money is needful in order to be able to travel at all. Needful is often applied to that which must be supplied to produce or effect a perfect state or action.

II. n.; pl. necessaries (-riz). 1. Anything that is necessary or indispensable; that which cannot be disregarded or omitted: as, the necessaries of life.

And they also have necessaries, and alle that hem nedethe, of the Emperours Court. Mandeville, Travels, p. 230.

Fear of poverty makes hus allow himself only plain necessaries. Steele, Spectator, No. 114.

2. A privy; a water-closet. - Necessaries of a ship, articles which should form part of the ordinary and reasonable outfit for the business in which the vessel is engaged, whatever a prudent owner would order if present.

necessarium (ne-kes'-i-um), n. [L. necessarium, necessary, + -ium.] Same as necessitarianism. Contemporary Rev. [Rare.]

necessitarian (ne-kes-i-ta'-ri-an), a. and n. [necessitarian + -arian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to necessity or to necessitarianism; opposed to libertarian.

II. n. One who maintains the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in opposition to that of the freedom of the will; opposed to libertarian.

The Arminian has entangled the Calvinist, the Calvinist has entangled the Arminian, in a labyrinth of contradictory notions. The advocate of free-will appeals to conscience and instinct - to an a priori sense of what ought in equity to be. The necessitarian falls back upon the experience of reality of facts. Freude, Calvinism.

necessitarianism (ne-kes-i-ta'-ri-an-izm), n. [necessitarian + -ism.] Same as necessitarianism.

necessitate (ne-kes-i-tat), v. t. pref. and pp. necessitating, pp. necessitating. [ML. necessitare, pp. of necessitare (< It. necessitare = Sp. necessitar = Pg. necessitare = It. necessitare, < L. necessitare = F. necessiter), make necessary, < L. necessitas (f.), necessity; see necessity, and cf. necessitate and necess.] For the form, cf. felicitate.] 1. To make necessary or indispensable; render unavoidable; cause to be a necessary consequence.

The politician never thought that he might fall dangerously sick, and that sickness necessitate his removal from the court. South.

Right as we can, think it necessitates the thought of not right, or wrong, for its correlative. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, 1, 90.

2. To force irresistibly; compel; oblige; compel by necessity.

No man is necessitated to more (yet no man is) in love caused. Sp. Early Microcosmography, A Private Man.

3. To reduce to a state of need; threaten or oppress by necessity or need, or the prospect of need.

It was a position of the States that he was not poor who wanted, but he who was necessitated. Jer Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 379.

We were now greatly necessitated for food, and wanted some fresh orders from the King's mouth for our future subsistence. R. Knox (Arber's Reg. Garner, I, 280).

= Syn. 2. To constrain, drive.

necessitation (ne-kes-i-ta'-shun), n. [necessitate + -ion.] The act of necessitating or making necessary; the state of being made necessary; compulsion. Hobbes, Liberty and Necessity.

necessitate (ne-kes-i-tat), v. t. [OF. necessiter, necessitate; see necessitate.] To necessitate; compel.

Who, were he now necessitated to beg, Would ask an alms like Cande Olivares. R. Johnson, New Inn, IV, 2.

necessitated (ne-kes-i-tat), a. [necessitate + -ed.] In a state of want; necessitous; controlled by necessity.

I bade her, if her fortunes ever stood Necessitated to help, that by this token I would relieve her. Shak., All's Well, V, 2, 33.

necessitous (ne-kes-i-tus), a. [F. necessiteux = Pg. It. necessitoso; as necessitate + -ous.] Pressed by poverty; unable to procure what is necessary for one's station; needy. Applied (a) To persons.

That we may suffer together with our calamitous and necessitous brethren. Jer Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 129.

They who were envied found no satisfaction in what they were envied for, being poor and necessitous. Clement, Great Rebellion.

We gentlemen of small fortunes are extremely necessitous in this particular. Steele, Tatler, No. 204.

(b) To circumstances.

He was not in necessitous circumstances, his salary being a liberal one. F. R. Winkler, Obscure Mental Diseases.

Syn. Needy, Necessitous (see needy); penurious, destitute, pinched, poor.

necessitously (ne-kes-i-tus-ly), adv. In a necessitous manner; as, to be necessitously circumstanced.

necessitousness (ne-kes-i-tus-ness), n. The state of being necessitous; the want of what is necessary for one's station; need.

Where there is want and necessitousness, there will be quarrelling. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

necessitude (ne-kes-i-tud), n. [L. necessitudo, inevitableness, need, distress, also intimate relationship or friendship, < necesse, inevitable, necessary; see necessity, necessity.] A sacred obligation of family or friendship; a tie or bond of relationship or intimacy.

Between kings and their people, parents and their children, there is so great a necessitude, propriety, and intercourse of nature. Jer Taylor.

The mutual necessitudes of human nature necessarily maintain mutual offices, and correspondence between them. Nir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

necessity (ne-kes-i-ti), n.; pl. necessities (-tiz). [Early mod. F. also necessitate, necessitate; < ME. necessite, necessite, necessite, < OF. necessite, F. necessite = Sp. necessitate = Pg. necessitate = It. necessitate, < L. necessitas (f.), unavoidableness, compulsion, exigency, necessity, < necesse, unavoidable, inevitable; see necessity.] 1. The condition or quality of being necessary or needful; the mode of being or of truth of that which is necessary; the impossibility of the contrary; the absolute character of a determination or limitation which is not merely without exception, but which would be so in any possible state of things; absolute constraint.

But who can tame the stream of destiny, Or break the chaine of strong necessity, Which that is tyde to Jove's eternal seat? Spenser, F. Q., I, v, 35.

He must die, as others, And I must lose him: 'tis necessity. Fletcher, Valentinian, III, 2.

That strength joined with religion, abused and pretended to, conditions each must of necessity breed the heaviest and most quelling tyranny. Milton, Church Government, II, 2.

2. As applied to the human will, the opposite of liberty. (a) Compulsion, physical or, more generally, moral, a stress upon the mind causing a person to do something unwillingly or with extreme reluctance, as, to make a virtue of necessity.

The necessity of necessity They then withdrew, and towards the Cites They took the way. Guerrilla (E. E. T. 8.), I, 282.

Then take his head; Yet never say that I Iss'd this Warrant but Necessity. J. Beaumont, Psycho, III, 184.

Necessity . . . was the argument of tyrants, it was the creed of slaves. But, On the India Bill, Nov. 18, 1782.

And the great power we serve ourselves may be Slaves of a tyrannous Necessity. M. Arnold, Myceinus.

(b) In philos., the inevitable determination of the human will by a motive or other cause. This is only a special use of the word in the free-will dispute. In philosophy generally, by the necessity of a cognition is properly meant a regular necessity or universality in reference to possible states of things, although some writers use the word to denote a constraint upon the power of thought.

Will and reason (reason also is choice), I seldom and vain, of freedom both despoiled, Made passive both, had served necessity. Milton, P. L., III, 110.

Not so.

Wherever thought is wholly wanting, or the power to act or forbear according to the direction of thought, there necessity takes place.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 13.

3. A condition requisite for the attainment of any purpose; also, a necessary of life, without which life, or at least the life appropriate to one's station, would be impossible.

These should be hours for necessities.

Not for delights. Shak., Ham. VIII., v. 1. 2.

When war is called a necessity, it is meant, of course, that its object cannot be attained in any other way.

Rumour, Orations, I. 48.

4. Want of the means of living; lack of the means to live as becomes one's station or is one's habit.

Off me shall go have both ayde and comfort
In all your needs of necessity.

Hom. of Parliament (P. E. T. S.), I. 3819.

I abjure all roasts, and choose

To wage against the enemy of the air;

To be a comrade with the wolf and owl

Necessity's sharp pinch! Shak., Lear, II. 4. 214.

5. Extreme need, in general.

See what strange arts necessity finds out.

Marlowe and Nahe, Dido, I. 142.

Hunger necessity, that hath no law,

Boares over our little lot.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 46.

Necessity is the mother of invention.

R. Franck, Northern Memoirs (written in 1658, printed in 1694). (Hartlett.)

6. Business; something needful to be done.

They that to you have necessity

Be gracious ever through your gentleness.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 41.

When he hadde byn a while convalesced, he toke love, and yode though the courts in his offit necessaries.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), I. 61.

7. Bad illicit spirit. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Dogmatism of necessity, the doctrine that all human actions are absolutely determined by motives, so that the will is not free. Internal necessity, see internal. Legal necessity, constraint by the law; also, that which one is constrained by the law to do, irrespective of consent. The word necessity is also used in the law to denote that degree of moral necessity which is recognized as justifying or excusing an act otherwise unlawful, such as the killing of an assailant in self-defense, also, particularly in the phrase public necessity, to designate the requirement of what is needed for reasonable convenience or facility and completeness in accomplishing a public purpose. Logical necessity, truth, not merely in the existing state of things, but in every state of things in which the proposition to which the necessity belongs should preserve its significance; the truth of that to know which it is sufficient to know the meanings of the words in which it is expressed. Money of necessity, coins (generally of unusual shape, and rudely fabricated) issued during a strike (see strike-piece), or in times of necessity, when there is an insufficient supply of gold and silver and the operations of the ordinary mints are suspended. Moral necessity. See def. 2. above. Natural necessity. See natural. Physical necessity, the necessity which arises from the laws of the material universe. This necessity is conditional, not absolute. Works of necessity, in the Sunday laws, any laws which are necessary to be done on Sunday for life, health, comfort, general welfare, and reasonable convenience for enjoying the leisure and the privileges of the day, such as the running of horse-cars, ferries, and, within reasonable limits, railroad trains, and such labors as are requisite for maintaining in their necessary continuity processes of manufacture incidental to civilization, such as keeping up the fires of a blast-furnace. - Syn. Necessity, Need. Necessity is more urgent than need; a merchant may have need of more money in order to be the most successful manager of his business; he may have a necessity for more cash in hand to avoid going into bankruptcy.

neck (nek), n. [< ME. necke, nekke, nicke, nakke, < AN. hnecca, the neck, the back of the neck, the nape of the neck, = OFries. hnecca, nekke = MD. neek, nick, nuck, D. nek = Mlat. nacke, lat. nake = OHG. hnecc (hnecc-h), hnecc-h, nacc, MHG. nake-knecc, G. nacken = Icel. hnakk = Sw. nacke = Dan. nakke, nape of the neck, back of the head. Cf. nuke, nape of the neck.] 1. That part of an animal's body which is between the head and the trunk and connects these parts. In every vertebrate the neck corresponds in extent to the cervical vertebrae, when such are distinguishable. It is usually narrower or more slender than the parts between which it extends. See cuts under man.

He hallo abouten his Neke 300 Peries orent, gode and grette, and knotted, as Pater Noster here of Ambr.

Maulerille, Travels, p. 107.

Or necklace for a neck to which the swan's
Is tawlier than her cygnets.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. Figuratively, life, from the breaking or severing of the neck in legal executions; as, to risk one's neck; to save one's neck. - 3. In anatomy: (a) The membrane connecting the hard parts of an insect's head with those of the thorax, and visible only when the head is forcibly drawn out. (b) The posterior part of the head when this is suddenly narrowed behind the eyes. (c) A slender anterior prolongation of the prothorax found in certain Diptera and Hymenoptera. - 4. In anat., a constricted part, or constriction of a part, like or likened to a neck: as, the neck of the thigh-bone; the neck of the bladder; the neck of the uterus. See cut under femur. - 5. The flesh of the neck and adjoining parts: as, a neck of mutton. - 6. That part of a thing which corresponds to or resembles the neck of an animal.

Some of them upon the necks of their lance have an hook, wherewith they attempt to pull men out of their saddles.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 62.

(a) That part of a garment which covers the neck: as, the high neck of a gown. (b) A long narrow strip of land connecting two larger tracts; an isthmus.

They followed with the neck of land, which we thought had been severed from the mainland.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 107.

(c) The slender upper part of any vessel which has a larger rounded body: as, the neck of a bottle, retort, etc.

Take the noblest and the strongest breezy water that go may have distilled out of pure my glory, and putte it into a glass clephr amphora, with a long necke

Book of Quante Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 5.

(d) In stringed musical instruments of the viol and lute families, the long slender part extending upward from the body, culminating in the head where the tension is regulated, and bearing in front the finger-board over which the strings (or such of them as are to be stopped) are stretched. (e) The part of an axle that passes through the hub of the wheel, also, a diminished part of any shaft resting in a bearing. (f) The round shank connecting the blade and the socket of a bayonet. (g) The constricted part joining the knob to the breach of a gun. (h) The contracted part of a furnace over the bridge, between the stack and the heating or melting chamber. (i) In printing, the slope between the face and the shoulder of a type. Sometimes called beard. (j) In bot. (1) In mosses, the collar or tapering base of the capsule. (2) In histology, the rim or wall of the archegonium which projects above the prothallium. It rests upon the venter, and is ordinarily composed of four longitudinal rows of cells. (k) The fluted up pipe or channel through which volcanic material has found its way upward. In modern volcanic areas the vent through which the lava, cinders, or ashes are ejected and reach the surface is generally concealed from view by the accumulated material which has been thrown out. In eruptive regions belonging to the older geological systems domination has so radically removed the overlying debris, so that the connection of the volcanic orifice with the more deep-seated regions can be seen and examined. This is particularly the case in the Carboniferous and Permian volcanic areas of Scotland. (l) The crook of the head of a golf club where it joins the shaft.

7. In the clump process of brickmaking, one of a series of walls of unburned bricks which together constitute a clump. The walls are built three bricks thick, about sixty long, and from twenty four to thirty high and incline inward against a central upright wall. The sides and top are faced with burned bricks.

necroscopy (nek-rō-sko-pi), n. [necropsis, < Gr. νεκρός, a dead body, + σκοπέω, < σκοπέω, view.] The examination of a body after death, post-mortem examination; autopsy. Also necropsy.

necrose (nek-rōs), v. t.; pret. and pp. necrosed, ppr. necrosing. [necrosis, < Gr. νεκrosis, < νεκρός, a dead body, + -osis, < οίωσις, to be or become affected with necrosis.]

He was taught in cases of comminuted fracture to take out the splinters of bone, . . . lest they should necrose and give rise to trouble.
Medical News, LIII 136

necrosis (nek-rō'sis), n. [NL., < L. necrosis, < Gr. νεκrosis, a killing, in passive sense death, < νεκρός, kill, denude, intr. and pass. mortify, < νεκρός, a dead body.] 1. In pathol., the death of a circumscribed piece of tissue. It may be produced by stoppage of the blood-supply, as in embolism, by mechanical violence, by chemical agency, or by excessive heat or cold. It may involve large masses of tissue, or small clusters of cells, or scattered individual cells. The necrosed tissue may be absorbed and replaced by normal tissue or by connective tissue. It may form a caseous mass, or the cavity may fill with lymph, forming a cyst. 2. In bot., a disease of plants, chiefly found upon the leaves and soft parenchymatous parts. It consists of small black spots, below which the substance of the plant decays. Also called spotting. — Coagulation-necrosis. See coagulation.

necrotic (nek-rō'tik), a. [necrosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Characterized by necrosis; exhibiting necrosis; dead, as applied to tissues.

necrotomic (nek-rō-tom'ik), a. [necrotomy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to necrotomy.

necrotomy (nek-rō'to-mi), n. [necropsis, < Gr. νεκρός, a corpse, + τομή, < τέμνω, temno, cut.] Dissection of dead bodies.

necrotype (nek-rō'tip), n. [necropsis, < Gr. νεκρός, a corpse, + τύπος, a type.] A type formerly extant in any region, afterward extinct; thus, indigenous horses and rhinoceroses are necrotypes of North America. Gill, Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 400.

necrotypic (nek-rō'tip'ik), a. [necrotype + -ic.] Having the character of a necrotype.

Nectandra (nek-tan'drā), n. [NL. (Rolander, 1776); irreg. < Gr. νεκταρ, nectar, + άνδρα (and-), male (mod. bot. stamen).] A genus of trees of the apetalous order Lauryaceae and the tribe Persea, known by the anthers with four cells in a curving line. There are about 70 species, found from Brazil to Mexico and the West Indies. They bear alternate right feather-combed leaves, loosely panicle flowers, and globose or oblong berries. The genus furnishes important timber-trees and some oils and aromatic products. See medicinal, I, and botany.

nectar (nek'tār), n. [= E. nectar = Sp. néctar = Pg. néctar = It. nettaro, < L. nectar = Gr. νεκταρ, the drink of the gods (see def. 1); usually explained, without probability, as < νεκτός, not (see ne), + νέω in νεωτός, kill (for ἀνέωτος, ambrosia, the food of the gods, ult. < ἀνέω, priv. + νέω, die).] 1. In classical myth., the drink or wine of the Olympian gods, poured out for them by Hebe and Ganymede, the cupbearers of Zeus. It was reputed to possess wondrous life-giving properties, to impart a divine bloom, beauty, and vigor to him so fortunate as to obtain it, and to preserve all that it touched from decay and corruption. See ambrosia.

He consumes the nectar of the goddess,
Homer's Nectar, to come short by odds
Of this delicious juice.
Titus Whittier (E. E. T. S.), p. 62.

The sweet peace-making draught went round, and Zeus Ephialtes did Nectar to all the other gods. Chapman, Iliad, I. 202.

2. Hence, any delicious and salubrious drink. Specifically — (a) A drink compounded of wine, honey, and spices. Also called pinet. (b) A sweet wine produced in the Greek islands: a name given indifferently to wines of similar quality.

3. In bot., the honey of a flower; the superfluous saccharine matter remaining after the stamens and pistils have consumed all that they require.

nectar-bird (nek'tār-bōrd), n. A honey-sucker or sunbird of the family Nectariniidae.

nectareal (nek-tā-rē-āl), a. [nectareous + -al.] 1. Pertaining to nectar; nectarean. — 2. Same as nectarial.

nectarean (nek-tā-rē-an), a. [nec-tareus, of nectar (see nectareous), + -an.] Pertaining to nectar; resembling nectar; very sweet and pleasant.

Choicest nectarean juice crown'd largest bowls
And overlook'd the brim, alluring sight,
Of fragrant scent, attractive, taste divine.
Gay, Wine.

nectared (nek'tārd), a. [nectar + -ed.] Imbued with nectar; mingled with nectar; abounding in nectar.

And a perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns.
Milton, Comus, l. 472.

nectarell, a. [In the quoted passage for nectareal, < nectar + -ell.] Like nectar; nectareous.

For your breaths too, let them smell
Ambrosia-like, or nectarell.
Herrick, To his Mistress.

nectareous (nek-tā-rē-us), a. [= Sp. nectareo = Pg. nectareo = It. nettareo, < L. nectareus, < Gr. νεκταρεος, nectareous, < νεκταρ, nectar; see nectar.] Same as nectarean.

Annual for me the grape, the rose, renew
The juice nectareous and the balmy dew.
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 132.

nectareously (nek-tā-rē-us-li), adv. In a nectareous manner.

nectareousness (nek-tā-rē-us-ness), n. The quality of being nectareous.

nectar-gland (nek'tār-gland), n. A gland secreting nectar or honey.

nectarial (nek'tā-ri-āl), a. [nectary + -al.] Of or pertaining to the nectary of a plant.

nectaried (nek'tā-ri-d), a. [nectary + -ed.] Provided with nectaries or honey-producing organs; said of flowers or plants.

nectarilyma (nek'tā-ri-li-mā), n. [NL., < nectarium, nectary, + Gr. λύμα, what is washed or wiped off, < λύω, L. luere, wash; see lute, lav.] In bot., a collection of long hairs found on the inner surface of some flowers, as Mry-anthes.

nectarine (nek'tā-rin), a. and n. [OF. nectarin = Sp. nectarino, < NL. nectarinus, < L. nectar, nectar; see nectar.] I. a. Sweet or delicious as nectar.

To their supper fruits they fell — Nectarine fruits, which the compliant boughs Yielded them.
Milton, P. L., iv. 332.

II. n. A variety of the common peach, from which its fruit differs only in having a rind devoid of down and a firmer pulp. Both fruits are sometimes found growing on the same tree. See peach.

Nectarinia (nek-tā-rin'i-ē), n. [NL., < nectarinus, of nectar; see nectarine.] The representative genus of the family Nectariniidae, in which the middle tail-feathers of the male are long-exserted. The species are African. N. famosa is an example. Cinnyris is a synonym.

Nectariniidae (nek'tā-ri-ni'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Nectarinia + -idae.] A family of oscine passerine birds, represented by the genus Nectarinia; the nectar-birds, honey-suckers, or sunbirds. They have an acute, often very long and arcuate bill, no vibrissae, and a naked nasal scale. The tongue is long, protrusile, and at the end bifid in such a way as to form a kind of tube or hamulettum for sucking the juices of flowers. There are 10 primaries, 12 rectrices, and the tail is serrate. The plumage as a rule is gorgeous or exquisite in its iridescence or sheen, greens and yellows being the principal colors. These beautiful birds are confined to the Ethiopian, Indian, and Australian regions. They are non-migratory and generally lay two white eggs in a woven pennisic nest. The nectar-birds represent or replace humming-birds in the Old World, though the two families belong to different orders. Nearest New World relatives are the Certhiidae or gnatcatchers. The Nectariniidae are sometimes divided into Nectariniinae, Pro-mopiniinae, and Archopiniinae. Also Cinnyridae, Nectariniidae, Nectarinidae.

nectarin (nek'tā-rin), v. t.; pret. and pp. nectarined, ppr. nectarining. [nectar + -in.] To mingle with nectar; sweeten. Cochran.

nectareous (nek'tā-ree-ŭs), a. [Gr. nēktar, nēktar, + ōus, a receptacle: see thron.] In bot., a honey- or nectar-case; a nectary; specifically, the spur of certain flowers.

nectarous (nek'tā-rus), a. [nectar + ōus.] Resembling nectar; nectarean.

From the gash
A stream of nectareous humour issuing flow'd

nectary (nek'tā-ri), n.; pl. nectaries (-riz). [= P. nectaire = Sp. Pg. nectario = It. nettario, < NL. nectarium (Linnaeus), a nectary (cf. Gr. nēktarion, a certain plant, otherwise thron; see Helenium), < Gr. nēktar, nectar: see nectar.] In bot., a part of a flower that contains or secretes a saccharine fluid. Sometimes it is a prolongation of the calyx, as in Tropaeum, or of the corolla, as in Viola, Aquilegia, and Aconitum; or it may belong to some other organ. The curious fringed scales of Par. nautia, those on the claws of the petals of Ranunculus, and the pits on those of the lilies and fritillaries are also nectaries, as are the crown of the narcissus, the processes of the passion-flower, and the inner minute scales of grasses. The name nectary should be restricted to those parts which actually secrete honey, care being taken not to confound these parts with the different kinds of disk.

Nectary of (a) Erythrina (Linnæus), (b) Passiflora (Linnæus), (c) Mimulus (Linnæus), (d) Passiflora (Linnæus), (e) Mimulus (Linnæus), (f) Mimulus (Linnæus), (g) Mimulus (Linnæus), (h) Mimulus (Linnæus), (i) Mimulus (Linnæus), (j) Mimulus (Linnæus).

2. In entom., one of two little tubular organs on the abdomen of an aphid or plant-louse, from which a sweet fluid like honey is exuded. Also called honey-tube, siphuncle, or cornicle.

nectocalycine (nek'tō-kal'i-sin), a. [nectocalyx (-calyx) + -ine.] Having the character of a nectocalyx; of or pertaining to a swimming-bell.

nectocalyx (nek'tō-ka-lik-sin), n.; pl. nectocalyces, nectocalices (-kāl'ik-siz, -kāl'i-siz). [NL. < Gr. nēktar, swimming (< nēktar, swim: see naut), & kalix, a cup, the envelop of a flower, etc.: see calyx.] A swimming-bell; the bell-shaped or discoidal natatory organ with which many hydrosomes are provided, and by means of which the hydrosome is propelled through the water. The nectocalyx alternately contracts and relaxes, giving rise to a gently undulatory movement. It consists of a cup or bell attached to the hydrosome by its base, and furnished with appropriate muscles for the execution of its movements. A nectocalyx is in zoology only an undeveloped axonal medusiform person, without a manubrium, tentacles or sense-organs. See cuts under Diphyidæ, medusiform, Hydrosoma, and Willula.

nectocyst (nek'tō-sist), n. [Gr. nēktar, swimming, & cystis, a bag.] Same as nectosac.

Nectopoda (nek-top'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. nēktar, swimming, & podē (pod-) = E. foot.] In couch., in De Blainville's classification (1825), one of two families (the other being Heteropoda) into which his order Nectobranchiata was divided. It was composed of the genera Pterodactylus (or Pteroda) and Carinarina, corresponding to the family Pterodactylidae in a broad sense, or to the modern families Pterodactylidae and Carinaridae, now referred to an order Heteropoda. See Heteropoda.

nectosac (nek'tō-sak), n. [Gr. nēktar, swimming, & sakos, a bag or sack: see sac.] The interior or cavity of a swimming-bell or nectocalyx. Also nectocyst.

nectosome (nek'tō-sōm), n. [Gr. nēktar, swimming, & sōma, body.] The upper or proximal portion of a siphonophorous stock modified for swimming; contradistinguished from the siphonosome, which is the nutritive portion.

Nectostem (nek'tō-stem), n. [Gr. nēktar, swimming, & E. stem.] In Hydrosoma, the axis of a series of nectocalyces.

Just below the first on the nectostem there is a small cluster of minute buds in which can be found the rudiments of all those in Apollonia. Stand. Nat. Hist., 4. 20.

nectomellid (nek-tō-mō'id), n. [Gr. nēktar, swimming, & E. mō'id.] A nectocalyx considered as a solid.

Necturus (nek-tū-rus), n. [NL. < Gr. nēktar, swimming, & urōs, tail.] A genus of amphibians: same as Menobranchius.

nedder. A Middle English form of nadder for ne hardie, had not.

nedder't, n. A form of nadder, usually adder. See nadder, adder.

nedder's, a. A dialectal form of nether.

neddy (ned'i), n.; pl. neddies (-iz). [A particular use of Neddy, dim. of Ned, a familiar form of Ed, a common dim. abbreviation of Edward. Cf. equiv. cuddy.] An ass; a donkey.

nedet, n., r., and adr. A Middle English form of need.

nedest, adr. A Middle English form of needs.

nedlet, n. A Middle English form of needle.

nee, r. s. An obsolete or dialectal form of neigh.

née (nā), a. [F. (< L. nata), fem. of nē (< L. natus), pp. of nātre, < L. nasci, be born: see nascere, natal.] Born: sometimes placed before a married woman's maiden name to indicate the family to which she belongs: as, Madame de Staël, née Necker (that is, Madame de Staël, born Necker, or whose family name was Necker).

need (nōd), n. [ME. need, nede, sometimes neeth, < AS. nēd, nīd, nēd, nēd, by unblat from neod, neod, necessity, need, compulsion, force, urgent requirement, want, etc., = OS. nōd = OFries. nōth, nēd = D. nōd = MLG. nōt = OHG. MHG. nōt, G. nōt, not = Lecl. nauth, nauthr, neyth = Sw. Dan. nōd = Goth. nauths, compulsion, force; cf. OFries. nauth, need; appar. with formative -d, orig. -th, perhaps from the root nau*, press, press close, appearing (prob.) in D. nautic, close, exact, = MHJ. nau, nouze, genouze, G. genat, exact, careful, = OSw. noga, noga, Sw. noga = Norw. nau, nau, nōr, nauver, nanger, narrow, close, = ODan. nage, Dan. nage, adv., exactly.] 1. The lack of something that is necessary or important; urgent want; necessity.

The knightes sat down and ate and dranke as thei that thur to have grete neede. Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 517.

Little neede there was, and less reason, the ship should stay. quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 161.

The Sea itself, which one would think should have but little need of Drink, Drinks ten thousand Rivers up. Cowley, Analectes, II.

2. Specifically, want of the means of subsistence; destitution; poverty; indigence; distress; privation.

As well knowe ye the neethe of the hinde as do I. Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 566.

Famine is in thy cheeks, Need and oppression starveth in thine eyes. Contemp. and beggary hunger upon thy back.

Shak., R. and J., v. 1. 70.

3. Time of want; exigency; emergency; as, "a friend in need is a friend indeed."

Thou shalt finde Fortune the fuller at tht moote neede. Piers Plowman (B) xl. 98.

For so many a neede he hadde hym socoured and holpen. Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 678.

Deserted at his utmost need. By those his former bounty fed.

Dryden, Alexander's Feast, l. 80.

4t. That which is needful; something necessary to be done.

Hoon to Surry ben they wend ful fayn, And doun her needes as they han doun yore. Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 70.

5t. A perilous extremity. Chaucer. At need, at one's need, at a time of greatest requirement; in a great extremity; in a strait or emergency.

Three fish queens, Who stood in silence near his throne, the friends Of Arthur, gazing on him, tall, with bright Sweet faces, who will help him at his need. Trappan, Counting of Arthur.

- Syn. 1. Necessity, Need (see necessity and emergency), emergency, strait, extremity, distress. - 2. Want, Indigence, etc. See poverty.

need (nēd), v. [ME. nēden, < AS. nēdan, nēdan, nēden, also neadan, compel, force, < nēd, nīd, nēd, nead, need, compulsion: see need, n.] 1. Trans. To have necessity or need for; want; lack; require.

They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. Mat. ix. 12.

An hundred and fiftie other Tenements for the yonge of the Cite, which have there an asper a day, and as much bread as they need. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 221.

Need, especially in negative and interrogative sentences implying obligation or necessity, is often used, in the present, before an infinitive, usually without to, need being then invariable (without the personal terminations of the second and third person singular): as, he or they need not go; need he do it? - Went, etc. See lack.

II. Intrans. To be wanted; be necessary: used impersonally.

It needeth not to telle son the names of the Cyclops, ne of the Townes that ben in that Weye. Manderly, Travels, p. 54.

There needeth no such apology. Shak., Rich. III., III. 7. 104.

In north of England I was born: (It needed him to lie.) Auld Mailland (Child's Ballads, VI. 204).

Merit this, but seeke onely Vertue, not to extend your Limits; for what needs? Milton, Reformation in Eng., l.

needt (nēd), adv. [ME. nede; adverbial use, like needs, of need, n.] Needs; necessarily.

The thinges that a man may not have, he muste needt suffer. Martin (E. E. T. S.), l. 70.

There is a need-be for removing Carlyle, French Rev., III. III. 4.

needdom (nēd'dom), n. [need + -dom.] The domain of want or need. Thackeray.

Idleness is the coach to bring a man to Needdom, prodigally the post-horse. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 408.

needer (nē'dēr), n. [need + -er.] One who needs or wants. Shak., Cor., iv. 1. 44.

needfire (nēd'fir), n. [See also needfire, formerly neidfir, etc.; < need + fire.] It was also called forced fire, in allusion to the mode of producing it. 1. A fire produced by the friction of one piece of wood upon another, or of a rope upon a stake of wood. From ancient times peculiar virtue was attributed to fire thus obtained, which was supposed to have great efficacy in overcoming the enchantment to which disease such as that of cattle, was ascribed. The superstition survived in the Highlands of Scotland until a recent date.

2. Spontaneous ignition. - 3. The phosphoric light of rotten wood. - 4. A beacon.

The ready page with hurried hand Awoke the needfire's slumbering brand, And ruddy blushed the heaven. Scott, L. of L. M., III. 20.

[Scotch in all uses.]

needful (nēd'ful), a. [ME. needeful, needful, needful, needful; < need + -ful.] 1. Having or exhibiting need or distress; needy; necessitous.

At the last, in this loud light am I here, Naked, & needful, as thou now wast. Instruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1222.

For thou art the poor man's help, and strength for the needful in his necessity. Isa. xxv. 4 (Coverdale).

2. Necessary; requisite.

These things ben needful to elche fourthe and apontement. Book of Quene Elizabeth (ed. Furnivall), p. 36.

The needful bits and curbs to headstrong woods. Shak., M. for M., I. 4. 20.

The needful, anything necessary or requisite; specifically, ready money, "the wherewithal." (Gollon, or slang.)

Mrs. A. You have the needful!

Mr. A. All but five hundred pounds, which you may have in the evening. Fudge, The Consens, III. 2.

nihlarin, a seamstress; prob. orig. with initial n, and thus related to fr. snathud, a needle, midle, a thread, and AS. snear, string, snare (see snare), and ult. connected with fr. nire = fr. nire, vir, spin (the fr. deriv. vire, a spindle, & vire + -re, is nearly identical in formation with E. needle.) 1. A small pointed instrument, straight or curved, for carrying a thread through a woven fabric, paper, leather, felt, or other material. It consists of a slender sharp pointed bar pierced with a hole for the thread, either at the blunt end, at the point, or in the middle. The first

1. The straight needle, with a point at one end, a hole in the middle, and a thread passing through it. 2. The curved needle, with a point at one end, a hole in the middle, and a thread passing through it. 3. The needle with a thread, showing the thread passing through the hole in the needle.

form is that of the common sewing-needle, the second, which is practically an awl within an eye at the point, is that of the sewing-machine needle, and the third form, which is made with a point at each end, is employed in some embroidery machines. Sewing-needles are commonly made of steel; they range in size from coarse darning needles to fine cable needles, and besides the distinctions of purpose and size are also classified, according to the shape and character of the eye, the sharpness of the point, and the style of finish, as drill-eyed, golden-eyed, sharp, between, blunt, blue pointed needles, etc.

Take two strong men and in Thimble cast him,
And both naked as a needle her nose ykore than other.
Piers Plowman (B), xii. 102.
Their thimbles into armed gauntlets change,
Their needles to lances. Shak, K. John, v. 2. 157.
Sharp as a needle; bless you, Yankee always are
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 274.

2. In a wider sense, any slender pointed instrument shaped like a needle or used in a similar way: as, a knitting, crochet, or engraving-needle; a surgeon's needle.—3. Anything resembling a needle in shape.

The turning of iron touched with the loadstone towards the north was found out in needles of iron, not in bars of iron.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.
Specifically (a) A small piece of steel pointed at both ends, and balanced centrally on a pivot, such as is used (1) in the magnetic compass, in which it points to the magnetic poles, and (2) in the needle-telegraph, in which its deflections, produced by electric currents, are used to give indications. See compass, magnet, dipping-needle, galvanometer, and needle-telegraph.

Caesar counsel be crafter, whene the crowde ryw a,
With the needle and the stone one the nyghte tydiz.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 732.
After which he observed a little Needle, supposed to have a power of fore-signifying danger.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 81.
(b) A thin rod, usually made of copper, which is inserted in a drill-hole while this is being charged with powder. When the rod is withdrawn, it leaves a space in which can be inserted the tube of such or gross or the fuse by which the charge is ignited. Also called a blasting needle, or a rod. (c) In sewing, a horizontal piece of wire with an eye to receive the lifting wire in a Jacquard loom. E. H. Knight. (d) A sharp pinhead of rock, a detached pointed rock. (e) In chem. and mineral., a crystal shaped like a needle; an acicular crystal. (f) In bot., a slender, sharp spine; an aculeum. (g) In bot., a needle-shaped leaf, as of a conifer; as, a pine needle. (h) In a central fire hammerless gun of the variety called needle-gun, a pointed, slender, longitudinally sliding bolt or wire which, being driven forcibly forward by the spring mechanism of the lock when the gun is fired, strikes with its front end against a fulminate or fulminating compound attached to the interior of the cartridge. The famous Prussian needle gun is believed to be the first gun constructed to be fired on this principle. See cut under needle-gun.

Hence, in comp., denegare, > ult. E. deny; see deny and denay.] To deny; negative; make negative or null. [Rare or technical.]

At the cost of negating . . . his past opinions.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Dec. 11, 1886, p. 274.

But desire for negation is still not aversion, until painfulness is added. The object to be negated must be felt to be painful, and may also be no thought of.

F. H. Bradley, Mind, XII. 22.

negatedness (nĕ-gāt-ed-ness), n. The state of being negated or denied.

Real pain is the feeling of the negatedness of the self, and therefore, as such, it is bad.

F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 118.

negation (nĕ-gā'shun), n. [= F. négation = Sp. negacion = Pg. negação = It. negazione, < L. negation (n), denial, < negare, pp. negatus, deny; see negate.] 1. The act of denying or of negating; the opposite of the act of affirming.

Descartes was naturally led to regard error as more or less a negation, or rather privation.

Feich, Intro. to Descartes's Method, p. 112.

By his principle, that determination is negation, reason is driven, in spite of himself, to dissolve everything in the dead abstraction of substance, in a pure identity that has no difference in itself, and from which no difference can by any possibility be evolved.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 48.

The affirmation of universal evolution is in itself the negation of an "absolute commencement" of anything.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol. App., p. 482.

Japanese art is not merely the incomparable achievement of certain harmonies in colour, it is the negation, the annihilation of everything else.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 746.

2. A denial; a declaration that something is not, or has not been, or will not be.

Our assertions and negations should be yes and nay; whatsoever is more than these is sin.

D. Rogers.

It is more cowardice to seek safety in negations.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v. 3.

3. The absence of that which is positive or affirmative; blankness; emptiness.

I hate the black negation of the bier.

Tennyson, Ancient Neg.

negationist (nĕ-gā'shun-ist), n. [< negation + -ist.] One who denies or expresses negation; especially, one who simply denies beliefs commonly held without asserting an opposite view.

We thus perceive that the skeptic is not the denier or dogmatic Negationist he is commonly held to be.

J. Owen, Evening with Skeptics, Pref., p. vii.

negative (neg'ā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. négatif = Pr. negatiu = Sp. Pg. It. negativo, < L. negativus, that denies, negative, < negare, pp. negatus, deny; see negate.] 1. Expressing or containing denial or negation; opposed to affirmative; as, a negative proposition.

I will again that I weigh not two chips which way the wind bloweth, because I see no inconsequence that may issue either of the affirmative or negative opinion.

Shanbhur, Descrip. of Ireland.

We have negative names, which stand not directly for positive ideas, but for their absence, such as insipid, alence, nil, &c., which words denote positive ideas, e. g. taste, sound, being, with a signification of their absence.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. viii. § 6.

2. Expressing or containing refusal; containing or implying the answer "No" to a request; as, a negative answer.—3. Characterized by the omission or absence of that which is affirmative or positive; as, a negative attitude; negative goodness.

There is another way . . . of denying (Christ, which is negative, when we do not acknowledge and confess him.

South, Sermons.

The negative standard of goodness, which results at least in abstaining from evil rather than in doing good, and is only too apt to degenerate into something very like hypocrisy.

H. S. Ozonham, Short Studies, p. 34.

Christ would never hear of negative morality. "thou shalt" was ever his word, with which he superseded "thou shalt not."

R. L. Stevenson, Scribner's Mag., IV. 166.

4. Having the power of stopping or restraining by refusing assent or concurrence; imposing a veto.

Denying me any power of a negative voice as king, they are not ashamed to seek to deprive me of the liberty of using my reason with a good conscience.

Edwin Hamilton.

5. In photog., showing the lights and shades in nature exactly reversed; as, a negative picture; a negative plate. See II., 5.—6. Measured or reckoned in the opposite direction to that which is considered as positive; neutralizing the positive; as, a debt is negative property.—Negative abstraction, argument, conception, condition, etc. See the nouns.—Negative crystal. See crystal and refraction.—Negative electricity. (a) According to Franklin's theory, that state of bodies in which they are deprived of some part of the electricity which they naturally contain. (b) Electricity developed by friction on resinous substances, as by rubbing sealing-wax with silk or flannel; resinous electricity. Negative evidence, eyewitness, image. See the nouns.—Negative exponent. See power.—Negative index of a logarithm. See logarithm.—Negative plate, the metal or equivalent placed in opposition to the positive in the voltaic battery. The negative may be coke, carbon, silver, platinum, or copper; the positive is usually zinc.—Negative pole of a magnet, the south-seeking pole. See magnet.—Negative pole of a voltaic battery, the extremity of the wire connected with the positive plate.—Negative power. See power.—Negative prescription. In Soc. law. See prescription.—Negative proposition, in logic, a proposition which denies agreement between the subject and its predicate.—Negative quantities. See quantity.—Negative radical, in chem., a radical which is acid or electronegative in relation to the element or radical with which it is compared.—Negative result of an experimental inquiry, the conclusion that nothing remarkable happens under the circumstances inquired into.—Negative servitude, sign, etc. See the nouns.—Negative wall. Same as absorbing wall (which see, under wall).*

II. n. 1. A proposition expressing a negation; a negative proposition.

If negatives we have the least certainty; they are usually headed, and many times impossible to be proved.

Millon.

The positive and the negative are set before the mind for its choice, and it chooses the negative.

Richards, Freedom of the Will, I. 1.

Of a merely completed development of activity with the end attained, we can only speak or think in negative, and then only can we speak or think of that state of being in which, according to our theory, the ultimate moral good must consist. T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 173.

2. A term or word which expresses negation or denial.

If your four negatives make your two affirmatives, why then, the worse for my friends and the better for my foes.

Shak. T. N., v. 1. 34.

3. The right or power of refusing assent; a veto; also, the power of preventing.

Their Government is an Anarchie: every one obeying and commanding, the meanest person amongst them having a Negative in all their consultations.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 528.

This man sits calculating varietal of excuses how he may grant least; as if his whole strength and royalty were plac'd in a meer negative.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, 21.

It was not stipulated that the King should give up his negative on acts of Parliament.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

4. That side of a question which denies what the opposite side affirms; also, a decision or an answer expressive of negation; as, the question was determined in the negative.—5. In photog., a photographic image on glass or other suitable medium, in which the lights and shades are the opposite of those in nature. The negative is used chiefly as a plate from which to print positive impressions on paper or other material. Its image presents natural high lights as more or less opaque, and diminishes in opacity by delicate gradations to the deepest shadows, which should be represented by unstained or transparent film.

6. Electricity like that developed by friction on resinous substances. See electricity.—7. In elect., the negative plate of a voltaic element; the metal or equivalent placed in opposition to the positive in the voltaic battery.—Double negative, a sign of negation repeated. In English and Latin, and in Sanskrit, such a double negative is equivalent to an affirmative, destroying the negation, but in most languages and in vulgar speech it is not. Negative nothing. See nothing.—Negative pregnant, in law, a negation implying an affirmation favorable to the adversary, or admitting of such an implication. as in pleading, if one alleged to have done a thing denies that he did it in manner and form as alleged, which is taken as admitting that he did it in some other manner.

Negative (neg'ā-tiv), v. t.; pret. and pp. negatified, ppr. negating. [< negare, a.] 1. To deny, as a statement or proposition; affirm the contradictory of; contradict; negate.

Although well armed, she is not, I think, a ship of war. Her rigging, build, and general equipment all negative a supposition of this kind.

For, M. Found in a Bottle.

2. To disprove; prove the contrary of.

The omission or infrequency of such recitals does not negative the existence of miracles.

Palcy.

3. To refuse assent to; refuse to enact or sanction; veto.

The proposal was negatived by a small majority.

Andrews, Anecdotes, p. 169.

We passed a bill . . . two years ago, but it was negatived by the President.

D. Webster, Speech, Senate, March 18, 1824.

negatively (neg'ā-tiv-ly), adv. In a negative manner. (a) With or by denial or refusal. as, to answer negatively. (b) By means of negative reasoning; indirectly opposed to positively.

I shall show what this image of God in man is, negatively, by showing wherein it does not consist, and positively, by showing wherein it does.

South.

(c) With negative electricity; by friction on some resinous substance.

Two negatively electrified bodies repel one another.

S. P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 4.

negativeness (neg'ā-tiv-ness), n. The state or quality of being negative, in any sense of that word.

negative-rack (neg'ā-tiv-rak), n. In photog., a grooved skeleton frame in which plates are supported on edge with one corner lowest, either to drain or for convenient storage or use.

negativism (neg'ā-tiv-izm), n. [< negative + -izm.] The standpoint assumed, or the views held, by a negationist.

A philosophy of most radical free thought "is pronounced," that is to say, negative, no agnosticism, and no metaphysical mysticism.

Pop. Sci. M., XXXV. 77.

negativity (neg'ā-tiv'-i-ti), n. [= F. négativité, as negative + -ité.] Same as negativeness. [Imp. Dict.] ent; it especially applies to failure to attend to what is considered duty. Negligent is generally applied to inattention to things, neglectful to inattention to persons. Neglected, by derivation, is stronger than negligent, but the difference is really small. Headless, thoughtless, etc., indicate lack of head, care, attention, thought, etc., where they are needed or due. All these words may apply to a particular occasion of failure, or indicate a habit or a trait of character; as, he is very headless. See neglect, v., and negligence.

negligently (neg'li-jent-li), adv. 1. In a negligent manner; with negligence; carelessly; heedlessly; with disregard of niceties of appearance, manner, or style, or of convention-alition.

That care was ever had of me, with my earliest capacity, not to be negligently trained in the precepts of Christian Religion. Milton, Apology for Simeon Stylites.

Britain whose genius is in verse expressed,
Bold and sublime, but negligently dressed.

Waller, On the Earl of Rosecommon.

2. So as to slight or show disrespect.

negligible (neg'li-jib-ib), a. [F. négligible, < négliger, < L. negligere, negligere, neglect; see neglect.] Capable or admitting of being neglected or disregarded; neglectable.

negligibly (neg'li-jib-ib), adv. In a quantity or to a degree which may be disregarded.

The work wasted . . . is negligibly small compared with the work done in driving the generator part.

Philosophical Mag., XXVI. 180.

negociet (né-gow'), n. [< OF. negoce, F. négoce = Sp. Pg. negocio = It. negozio, < L. negotium, ML. also negotium, employment, occupation, < nec, not, + otium, leisure, ease, inactivity; see otiose. Hence negotiate, etc.] Business; occupation; employment. Bentley.

negotiability (né-gô-shi-bil'-i-ti), n. [< F. négociabilité; see negotiable + -ity (see -bility).] The quality of being negotiable, or transferable by assignment.

negotiable (né-gô-shi-bil), a. [< F. négociable = Sp. negociable = Pg. negociavel = It. negoziabile, < ML. negotiabilis, < L. negotiari, negotiate; see negotiate.] Capable of being negotiated. Negotiable paper, negotiable instrument, etc., an evidence of debt which may be transferred by indorsement or delivery, so that the transferee or holder may sue on it in his own name with like effect as if it had been made to him originally: such are bills of exchange, promissory notes, drafts, or checks payable to the order of a payee or to bearer. (Parsons.) The peculiar effects of negotiability are, in the rule of law, that a transferee in good faith and for value, in the ordinary course of business and before maturity, can usually recover of the maker, drawer, or acceptor, irrespective of defenses the latter might have against the transferor; and that a transferee by indorsement can recover of the indorser in case of default of the maker, acceptor, or drawer, if due notice thereof was given. A sealed instrument, unless issued by a corporation or state, is not usually deemed negotiable.

negotiant (né-gô-shi-ant), n. [< F. négociant, < L. negotian(t)s, ppr. of negotiari, carry on business; see negotiate.] One who negotiates; a negotiator.

Ambassadors, negotiants, and generally all other ministers of mean fortune in conversation with princes and superlours must use great respect.

Raleigh, Arts of Empire, xiv.

negotiate (né-gô-shi-ât), v.; pret. and pp. negotiated, ppr. negotiating. [Formerly also negociate; < L. negotiatus, pp. of negotiari (> It. negoziare = Sp. Pg. negociar = F. négocier), carry on business, < negotium, business; see negoce.] 1. intrans. 1. To carry on business or trade.

They that received the talents to negotiate with did all of them, except one, make profit of them. Hammond.

2. To treat with another or others, as in the arrangement of a treaty, or in preliminaries to the transaction of any business; carry on negotiations.

He that negotiates between God and man.

Cooper, Task, II. 463.

II. trans. 1. To arrange for or procure by negotiation; bring about by mutual arrangement, discussion, or bargaining; as, to negotiate a loan or a treaty.

Lady . . . is gone into the country with her lord, to negotiate, at leisure, their intended separation.

Chatterfield.

The German chancellor, Bishop Conrad of Hildesheim, who had crowned the King of Cyprus, negotiated the marriage and succession.

Stable, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 171.

2. To direct; manage; transact.

I sent her to negotiate an affair in which if I'm detected I'm undone.

Conyngre, Way of the World, III. 4.

3. To handle; manage. [Colloq.]

The rider's body must be kept close to the saddle in leaping, for if he were jerked up, the weight of say only a thousand men coming down on the horse a couple of seconds after he has negotiated a large fence is sufficient to throw him down.

Essex, Brit., XII. 197.

The fallen timber on the slopes presents continual obstacles, which have to be negotiated with some care to avoid being spiked by the sharp dead branches.

Portmuth, Rec., N. B., XLIII. 20.

4. To put into circulation by transference and assignment of claim by indorsement; as, to negotiate a bill of exchange.

The notes were not negotiated to them in the usual course of business or trade.

Kent.

5. To dispose of by sale or transfer; as, to negotiate securities.

negotiation (né-gô-shi-â-shon), n. [Formerly also negociation, < F. négociation = Sp. negociación = It. negoziazione, < L. negotiatio(n)-, the carrying on of business, a wholesale business, < negotari, carry on business; see negotiate.] 1. Trading; mercantile business; trafficking.

I exceedingly pitied this brave unhappy person, who had lost with those prizes £40,000 after 20 years' negotiation in the East Indies.

Kelvin, Diary, Sept. 29, 1860.

2. Mutual discussion and arrangement of the terms of a transaction or agreement, whether directly or by agents or intermediaries; the act or process of treating with another or others in regard to the settlement of some matter, or for the purchase or sale of a commodity, etc.; as, the negotiation of a treaty or a loan.

Any treaty of confederacy, of peace, of truce, of intercourse, of other foreign negotiations (that is specially noted for one of my inkhorn words).

Harvey, Horace's Supererogation.

In negotiation with others, men are wrought by cunning, by importunity, and by vehemency.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 294.

Languid war can do nothing which negotiation or submission will not do better.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. In com., the act or procedure by which a bill of exchange, etc., is made negotiable—that is, made capable, by acceptance and indorsement, of being passed from hand to hand in payment of indebtedness, or of being transferred to another for a consideration. See negotiable.

negotiator (né-gô-shi-â-tor), n. [< F. négociateur = Sp. Pg. negociador = It. negoziatore, < L. negotiator, one who does business by wholesale, a banker or factor, a tradesman, an agent, < negotari, carry on business; see negotiate.] One who negotiates; one who treats with others as either principal or agent in commercial transactions, or in the making of national treaties or compacts.

negotiatry (né-gô-shi-â-to-ri), n. [< L. negotiatorius, of or belonging to trade or tradespeople, < L. negotiator, a trader, negotiator; see negotiator.] Relating to negotiation.

negotiatrice (né-gô-shi-â-triks), n. [= F. négociatrice = It. negoziatrice, < L. negotiatrice, fem. of L. negotiator, negotiator; see negotiator.] A female negotiator.

Our fair negotiatrice prepared to show the usual degree of gratitude.

Mac Edgeworth, Manners, xv.

negotiosity (né-gô-shi-ô-si-ti), n. [< L. negotiositas (t), an abundance of business or occupation, < negotiosus, busy; see negotious.] The state of being negotious, or engaged in business; continued and absorbing occupation.

negotious (né-gô-shus), a. [= Sp. Pg. negocioso = It. negoziioso, < L. negotiosus, full of business, busy, < negotium, business, occupation; see negoce.] [< otiose.] Engrossed in business; fully employed; busy; active.

Some servants, if they be set about what they like, are very nimble and negotious.

J. Rogers.

negotiousness (né-gô-shus-ness), n. The state of being actively employed; activity.

God needs not our negotiousness, or double diligence, to bring his matters to pass.

D. Rogers, Naaman the Syrian, p. 602.

Negritian (né-grish-an), a. and n. See Nigritian.

Negrato (né-grô-tô), n. [< Sp. negrito, dim. of negro, black; see negro.] One of a diminutive dark-skinned negro-like race found in the Philippine Islands (of which they seem to have been the original inhabitants), and in New Guinea, etc., according to some authorities. The average height of the Negritos of the Philippine Islands is about 4 feet 8 inches. Also Negrillo.

negro (né-grô), a. and n. [= F. nègre (> E. nigger, now nigger = D. G. Dan. Sw. neger = Russ. negr; see nigger), < Sp. Pg. It. negro, black, as a noun, negro, m., negra, f., a black person; a negro; It. also nero = Fr. nègre, nier = OF. negre, nigre, nece, ner, neir, F. noir, black, < L. niger (nigr-), black, dark, dusk, applied to the night, the sky, a storm, etc., to pitch, etc., to ivy, etc., to the complexion ('dark'), etc., and also to the black people of Africa, etc. (but the ordinary terms for 'African negro' or 'African' were Æthiops and Æfer); also, fig., sad, mournful, gloomy, ill-omened, fatal, etc. Cf. Skt. nig, night; but whether Skt. nig, night, is related to nakta, night, or either to L. niger, black, is not clear. From L. niger are also ult. E. nigrescent, nigritude, Nigella, niella, anneal (in part), etc. The words Moort, blackmoor, in the same sense, are much older in E. I. n.; pl. negresses (-grôss). A black man; specifically, one of a race of men characterized by a black skin and hair of a woolly or crisp nature. Negroes are distinguished from the other races by various other peculiarities—such as the projection of the visage in advance of the forehead; the prolongation of the upper and lower jaws; the small facial angle; the flatness of the forehead and of the hinder part of the head; the short, broad, and flat nose, and the thick projecting lips. The negro race is generally regarded as comprehending the native inhabitants of Sudan, Senegambia, and the region southward to the vicinity of the equator and the great lakes, and their descendants in America and elsewhere; in a wider sense it is used to comprise also many other tribes further south, as the Zulus and Kafirs. The word negro is often loosely applied to other dark or black-skinned races, and to mixed breeds. As designating a "race," it is sometimes written with a capital.

Toward the south of this region is the kingdom of Guinea, with Senega, Ialofa, Gambia, and many other regions of the black Moors called Ethiopians or Negroes, all which are watered with the river Negro, called in owide tyme Nigir.

R. Eden, First Three English Books on America

(ed. Arber), p. 274.

II. a. Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of black men or negroes; as, negro blood; negro dances.

It is often asked what Races are Negro, as the meaning of the term is not well defined. . . . The word is not a National appellation, but denotes a physical type, of which the tribes in North Guinea are the representatives. When these characteristics are not all present, the Race is not Negro, though black and woolly-haired.

R. N. Cud, Mod. Langs. of Africa, p. 53.

Negro bat, Vesperugo naumae, a bat of a dark or black color, widely distributed in Europe and Asia.—Negro cachexy, case. See the noun.—Negro coffee, see Cassia and coffee.—Negro corn, or negro guinea-corn, a name given in the East Indies to Indian millet or durra.—Negro fly, the Pala nigr, a dipterous insect, so named from its shining black color. It is also called carrot-fly, because the larvae are very destructive to carrots.—Negro lethargy, see lethargy.—Negro minstrels. See minstrel.—Negro monkey, the budeng, Simulphicus naumae.—Negro peach, pepper, tamarind, yam. See the noun.

negro-bug (né-grô-bug), n. A black, white-striped hemipterous insect, Corimela pulicaria, resembling the common chinch-bug. It feeds on the raspberry, strawberry, apple, guinea, and many other plants, puncturing and injuring fruit, blossom, and stem, and imparting to the fruit a nauseous odor and taste which often render it unsalable. The name is extended to the other members of the Corimelidae. See cut under Corimelidae.

negrofy (né-grô-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. negrofied, ppr. negrofying. [< negro + -fy.] To turn into a negro. Davies. [Rare.]

And if no kindly cloud will paraol me,

Fruiting branch of Neillia spinulosa.
a, a flower; b, fruit; c, a leaf, showing the serration.

There are 4 or 5 species, of North America, Manchuria, and mountains of India and Java. They bear alternate lobed leaves and clustered white flowers followed by purplish pods. N. (Spinosa) spinulosa, called Neillia from the numerous layers of its loose bark, is common in the interior of the United States, and is sometimes planted.

ne injuste vexes (nē in-jus'tē vek'sē). [L. vex not unjustly; ne, not; injuste, unjustly, < injustus, unjust (see unjust); vexes, 2d pers. sing. pres. subj. of vexare, vex: see vex.] In old Eng. law, a writ issued in pursuance of the provisions of Magna Charta, forbidding a lord to vex unjustly a tenant by distraining for a greater rent or more services than the latter was legally bound for.

neir, n. See *neer*².

neirhand, adv. An obsolete or dialectal form of near-hand.

neist (nēst), adv., prep., and a. A dialectal form of next.

neither (nē'thēr or nī'thēr), a. and pron. [< ME. neither, nyther, nether, also nather, nawther, nouthor, nouthor, nother, < AS. nāther, nāthor, nōther, nūthor, nūthar, nūthor, nūthor, contr. of nā-hwæther (= OFries. nahuweder, nader, noder, nēr), adj., pron., and conj. neither, < ne, ne + dwæther, ather, etc.; either: see either]. The form neither conforms in spelling and pron. to either; it would reg. be only nother (nō'thēr), there being no AS. form of ægher (whence E. either) with the negative. The variation in the pronunciation of neither depends on that of either. See either.] I, a. Not either. See either.

Love made them not with arture they may be,
Where neither party is nor true nor kind.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 186.

II. pron. Not one or the other. See either, pron.

Ac hor neither, as me may be in pur righte naa.
Rob. of Gloucester, l. 174.

Both? one? or neither? Neither can be enjoyed
If both remain alive.
Shak., Lea, v. 1. 58.

In this Division of Advices, when they could not do both,
they did neither.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 159.

Both thy brethren are in Arthur's hall,
Albeit neither loved with that full love
I feel for thee.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

Neither neither, neither the one nor the other.

For as for me is lever non ne lother,
I am withholden yet with neither neither.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 192.

neither (nē'thēr or nī'thēr), conj. [< ME. neither, nyther, etc., nather, nouthor, nouthor, nother, etc., contr. also nor, which now prevails as the second form in the correlation neither . . . nor; < neither, a. and pron., being the same as either with the negative prefixed: see neither, a. and pron.] 1. Not either; not in either case; a disjunctive conjunction (the negative of either), preceding one of a series of two or more alternative clauses, and correlative with nor (or, formerly, neither or ne) before the following clause or clauses.

Neither with engyne ne with lore.

Chaucer, Troilus, ll. 565.

Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.

And feast your eyes and ears
Neither with dogs nor bours.
R. Jonson, Masque of Owls.

Abul Hasan spared neither age, nor rank, nor sex.

Irring, Granada, p. 61.

2. Not in any case; in no case; not at all: used adverbially for emphasis at the end of the last clause, when this already contains a negative. This usage is no longer sanctioned by good authorities, either being now employed. See either, conj., 2.

If the men be both nought, then prayers be both like.
For neither hath the one lyst to pray, nor thouthor neither.
Sir T. More, Comfort against Tribulation (1578), fol. 44.

Nematelminthes (nem-a-thel-min'thes), n. pl. [NL., Gr. nematē (nem-a-thel-min'th), n. pl. Same as Nematelminthes.] A class of Fermes, including nematoid worms and certain related forms; the roundworms or threadworms. They are round or cylindrical worms, sometimes extremely slender and filiform or thread-like, from less than an inch to several feet in length, found everywhere, and mostly parasitic (endoparasitic). Those that are never parasitic are generally of very minute size. Some are parasitic in the larval state, and free when adult; in others this is reversed. The body is not truly segmental, though the cuticle may be ringed. The class is chiefly made up of the Nematodes: it includes, however, the Acanthocephala (Reinhardtia), and formerly the Chaetognaths (Sagitta) were added. The term is sometimes used synonymously with Nematodes. See cuts under Nematodes, Acanthocephala, and Sagitta.

nematelminthic (nem-a-thel-min'thik), a. [Gr. nematē (nem-a-thel-min'th), a. and n. Of or pertaining to the Nematelminthes.]
